LONDON READER

of Literature, Science, Art, and General Anformation.

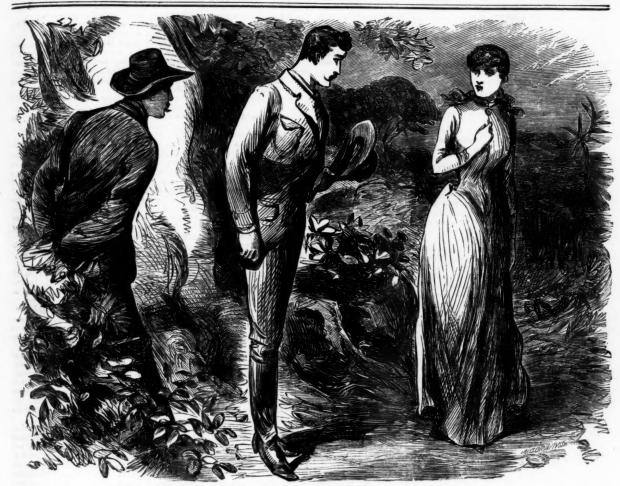

[ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

No. 1439 .- VOL. LVI.]

el is soly uro-noh of The 112 to

FOR THE WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 29, 1890.

PRIOR ONE PENER.

[DESPITE HER APPEARANCS, BOTH SENNETH AND MARTIN FELT THAT THE NEW COMER WAS A LADY!]

A BEAUTIFUL CLAIMANT. | look at the city of the future; but neither of

PROLOGUE.

PROLOGUE.

BOUTH Aranda, some four years back, when what is to-day an important city, was but a handful of canvas tents, an encampment of the first gold-seekers, lured thither by the ramour that fortunes were to be made in no time, and that in that wild, irregular way of ilt no passport of respectability, no certificate of honesty, was required.

It was night. The tents, or huts as they were often called, looked picturesque by the red, lurid glow of the lamps; and two Englishmen, who were taking a stroll before turning in for the night, paused a moment in admiration of the strange, weird look of the encampment.

mes.

Both of them were strangers to the place.

One had come out to Africe to see his relations in Cape Town, the other had accompanied him for the sake of the voyage. They had come on the hundreds of miles after the railway ceased, because they wanted to have a them had any intention of trying his luck at the mines.

Both were in easy, if not afficent, circum-

Vere Thornton was the only son of a country Squire, of whom noshing was expected but an interest in the property one day to be his own; and Kenneth Marvin had been called to the Bar, and allowed himself this four months' pleasure trip in Africa before settling down to the rather monoconous career of waiting for briefs.

He had a small private income, and increased it by literature.

Kenneth would probably never make a great writer; but short stories, and terse, vigorous articles came readily from his pen, and he hoped to take back many fresh "ideas" for future use from this southern trip.

They were only going to stay two or three days at the gold-fields. Vere declared that the heat and dust were intolerable, while the people made him ashamed of his country. This last was an extreme view; but, in truth, among the mosley crowd gathered at Basefontein, most of the Englishmen did look desperately down on their luck—as though, indeed, they had reached such a pitch of misfortune that they could not sink much lower.

To these it was evident the gold-diggings had been a last resource; and if fortune did not favour them it was terrible to think of their next step.

had been a last resource; and it fortune du not favour them it was terrible to think of their next step.

"It's nothing but gambling," said Mr. Thornten, a litt! severely to his friend. "They spend the last shilling they can scrape to gether in the attempt to get here, and obtain a 'claim,' as they call it. Then, if there's no gold on it they're ruined. Upon my word, Martin, I don's see much difference between a gold-claim and a lottery-ticket; and the last a man would enjoy in comfort without wait-ing his fate among such surroundings."

"Hush!" said Martin, simply, "there's someone coming. I think it's a lady!"

He was right. Despite the strangeness of the time and scene—not far from midnight—alone beyond the bounds of the little canvas town, despite her plain calico dress, here head, and lonely appearance, both men felt insunctively that the new comer was a lady.

Martin raised his hat as though she had been a princess, and addressed her with what he thought must be reassuring information. "You are close to the settlement," he said, kindly. "You will see the light of the lamps."

in a moment if you have lost your way."

She shook her head.

"I am not going back to the camp, thank you. I am looking for the doctor. He must pass this point on his way back to his hut."

"If you will intrust us with a message we will give it him," said Kenneth, eagerly, for he could not bear the thought of that girl

"But would you know him?"
"I do not think we could mistake," said Mr. Thornton, joining in the conversation for the first time. "You see there will not be many people passing at this boar."

"And he riders white horse?" raid the girl, simply. "If you would watch for him, and tell him my brother is worse, I should be so thankful."

"We will give the message," Kenneth assured her; "but it would be better for us to know the pattent's marie. You set the doctor might not understand who required him!"

"I forgo!. Please fell him that Jock Bovington is worse. We think he is dying, and we cannot keep him quiet."

The moon fell on her ince as the spoke, and both men felt a thrill of pity. She looked young—barely eighteen; and, espite the roughness and freedom of scamp life, she seemed to have retained all the modest dignity of early girkhood. girlhcon.

girincot.

Her complexion was clear and colourless, her hare a beautiful chade of chestnut brown, while her large eyes resembled in colour and softness a purple hearteness.

"You may trust us," and Reshelt, warmly, "But will you notes my friend see you safely back to your hus while I wait here for the doctor?"

"Os, no," said the girl, quickly, "they would not like it;" and then, so though feering her words had been togracious, are turned to Vere with a wistful maile. "You see, my brother is so afraid of strangers when the delirium is on him."

She passed away as suddenly as she had come, but the current of the friend's thoughts was changed.

"What a shame to bring a girl like that to this heathenish sort of life!" said Vere,

"I don't know. Perhaps also and her brother are alone in the world, and she preferred coming with him to being left behind. Poor fellow! I suppose he has the camp fever, as

"More likely the fever that comes from too much brandy. Most probably he is in delirium tremens. It sounded like it."

They had not to wait long for the doctor, whose white horse bore him so quickly by that they had much ado to attract his notice. He proved to be a middle aged Scorobman, well searoued to all hinds of chimnes and society, but yet with a fund of hindly feeling no amount of globe trotting meaned to have extraversed!

"Jack Bovington," he repeated, with a sigh.
"Thank you, gentlemen. I'll go round directly for the take of the little last; but it's little good decour or medicine can do her prother. A skd care as ever I saw: A yoring fellow with everything about him to attract people, and yet his file wreaked by one curse."
"Meaning drink?" said Vere, thoughtfully.

The design nodded.
"His a twen going the pace for three years, ever since his father died. If he hadn't had a splendid constaution to start with he'd have done for himself long ago."

"Bövington," repeated Kenneth, thoughtfully, when the doctor had galloped off. "I am ours I have heard that name before."

"Which the were in our part of the world, I expect. Boylegion Manor is the thory place of the neighbourhood, and Miss Bovington the per topic of conversation."

"Why? Is she mad, beautiful, or a first?"

"She may have been the two last half a She is one of the cleverest women I ever met. My father swears by her, and likes to consult her on everything connected with his estate."

"Then why is she the topic of general conversation?"

"Because she is enormously rich; and as she is turned eighty, people suppose she can't keep her money bereek much longer, and take an extreme interest in speculating what she will do with it."

"I suppose she has a hoard of hungry nephews and nieces ?"

"On the contrary, she was an only child. The story runs that about sixty years ago she was engaged to ber first coucin, and that when the parents broke off the match she refused to think of matermony again."

"Then the happy first course will be the lucky man."

"He must be dead and buried years ag "He must be dead and buried years ago. He would be ninely turned if he were slive. Come, Kenneth, if we are to have any night at all we had better go back to the Hotel, as they call our rionely stode."

And so they dismissed the subject of the Bovingtons from their mind, and spoke no more of the girl who had appeared so suddenly in the moonlight.

in the moonlight.

Perhaps each had a scoret motive for the silence. Her beauty had impressed them for more than they would have acknowledged.

Remoth price her increasely, because he felt she leved the soveperable brother have as seen to less, and all Vere Thornton's English projudices were account at the thought of her lonely position.

But thought they both thought of her in secret, neither guessed the obtendmentances under which they were to meet her again, nor the strange, subtle shread that was to interweave her life with theirs.

CHAPTER I.

Bovincton Minon was not ten miles from The Sycamore, as Mr. Thornton's place was called. Indeed, by the short cost across the field, the distance was little more than five; and often had the robust, hearty Squire waked over to lunch with his neighbour, to consult her about some favourité horse or some choice specimen of positive, just introduced into his home farm—for Miss Bovington took the warment internate in things strigal. took the warmest interest in things sgricul-tural, and her opinion had often more value than that of a practical farmer.

The old maid was a formidable person to meat people. Even many of her neighbours looked on her with a little wholesome dread; and the Squire's wife always declared one and one squires wite always declared one glance from Miss Bovington's black eyes seemed to petrify her. But Mr. Thornton was honestly fond of his old friend, and put up with her sharp speeches as no one else would do.

Perhaps she seemed a link with his lost youth, for she still treated him as a boy who required to kept in order, while she was the only person who continued to address the irascible old gentleman as "Jim." It was about a month after Vere Thornton

It was about a menth after Vere Thornton and his friend had quitted Canvas City, and the young men were on their way to England. The Squire was rejoing in the news his boy would be home in less than a week when his daughter came cancing into the room, where he sat reading vere a letter. A pray light, hearted girl, and a good one, too, was Kitiy Thornton, and the pride of both her parents.

"Papa!" she exclaimed, excitedly. "Miss Bovington has sent over. She wants you to go to the Manor at once. Anthony is awfully mysterious, and won's give me even a fint what has happened."

The Squire rose at once. He had lunched

The Squite rose at circe. He had lunched with Miss Berington the day before, and she had expressly said she should not expect him over again for a week, as she knew he had visitors. Although the richest woman for miles round Rebecca Bovington never gave herself are: She was abrupt and outspoken, because it was her nature, but she never dreamed of expecting her friends to be always at her beck and call, or upsetting their plans to suit her own convenience. Anthony, theold coachman, who in point of age came between the Squire and his lady, touched his has re-pectfully as Mr. Thornton appeared.

"Beg pardon, sir, but the mistress sent her regards, and begged you'd come over at once."

Evidently Miss Bovington had calculated on her friend's compliance. Anthony had brought the carriage and pair. The bays were the fleetest horses for miles round; there was to be no delay in harnessing the Squires own

"Is there snything the matter, Tony?" demanded Mr. Thornton. "I saw your mis-trees only yesterday, and she seemed quite well then."

Tony shaddered.

Well then."

Tony shaddered.

"I can't say nothing, sir," he replied, with a look of terror, which was not lost upon the Squire. "What the mistress wants yot to know she'll tell you herself; but it's evil day that are coming to Bovington, and well all be surprised before we are many weeks often."

The Squire's first impression was that the old man had been drinking. Kits, who tised at her father's clow, was more movidal in her verdict. She felt sure Actiony had received a terribute fright.

"Paps," and whitepered to the Squire, "do go with him. I am sure there is something the matter at the Manor!"

"If where is, that fellow Durcan is at the bottom of it," said the Squire irritably. "I wish his evil face had never been sen in Yorkwhite."

The Squire got into the carriage and drove off just as he was, in his choosing jacket and easy slippers. He said afterwards he was to taken aback he never thought of anything but getting to Bovington was callty four, and in more ways than one the marved of the prink. She had never been known is all anything runmer or winter. Heat of cold secard to have needed on her; and but for the servais suffering from consecund disorders, the Masor would have been a dead low to the village doctor.

The old maid runsed to have a companion, village doctor.

The old maid refused to have a companion, declaring the preferred solitude to garchased society. Through intensely hospitable, and delighting to invite her friends to lunch or dimer, nothing would induce her to have any guests staying in the house. Bovington Manor could have accommodated thirty visitors easily, so the number of rooms given over to seclusion and disuse may be guessed.

There was nothing miserly or penuious about Miss Rebesca. She lived in the same state at ther father had done. A butter and footman presided over her meals. A groom and coachman attended to her stables, an army of gardeners made the grounds a marvel of beauty, and quite a dozen female servants were under the orders of the dignified little-keeper; but all the servants, male and anothe mesper; out all the servants, male and famile, with one exception, slept in the left wig. Miss Bovington and her misid alors occupied the main building; and, as the Squire had pointed out to her a dozen time, sits and Elizaboth were as utterly at the mero, of burglars as though the army of demostles had not been in the other path of the bonts. Rebisca Bovington parhaed to chains let who would seek to murder her.

Rebesca Bovington refused to change lithables. She had no enemies, she declared,

The plate and all portable valuable were safe in the butler's charge; and she did not believe think so badly of human nature as to believe thieves would try to frighten a helpfest old woman, who had never it jured anyone in her life Besides the country of the state of life Besides, she considued, for over thirty years also and Elizabeth had been as much unprotected as they were new, and if harm

As the lady of the Manor was noted for her obsines, her friends yielded the point.

Miss Bovington and Elizabeth continued (as Mrs. Thornton phrased it) to dety Providence and so far they had escaped any unplassint consequences.

pleasant consequences.

The Squire found himself thinking a greatdeal of his old friend's caprice as he was borne swiftly towards the Manor.

withy towards the manor.

He had for Resecce Bovington almost a mothetly affection, and he did not hide from himself that when anything happened to his old neighbour it would be like losing a dear

She was eighty-four, but then ahe seemed younger in her habits than many a woman of sixty. Still she had passed the usual limits of human life, and be could hardly hope for on means me, and no count marchy rope for her to see many more years. For the first time the Squire asked himself the question which had long occupied the minds of the neighbourhood in general—who would be Rebecca. Bovington's heir?

massor and neighboursond in general-who would be Rebecca Bovington's heir?

The Squire was in easy circumstances himself, buthis wealth was as nothing compared to that his old friend bad to dispose of.

The Bovingtons had been in Yorkshire for enteries, and, like many old families, they had gene on steadily getting richer. It was the habit of the race to marry hetresses; and though there was no entail on the property it had been the firvariable custom to leave nearly enrything to the eldest son.

Bydney Bovington, Rebecca's father, had commisto a clear thirty thousand a year, and, besides the Manor, a small estate in Stafford-shire, in which coul had recently been found; so that for years Rebecca had been growing richer and richer, until even an intimater intend like the Squire could form no exaction of her fortune.

ide of her fortune.

Bbs had been engaged to her cousin Arthur, a delicate, studious youth, and the parents had broken off the match on account of the bad health of the intended bridgeroom.

The had some to Anatomic in a fit of pigus.

He had gone to Australia in a fit of pique, accompanied by his only brother, to whome he was much attached.

Their father, Walter Bovington, died soon after, and his little property was, at the brothers' desire, transferred to them in Melsourne.

From that day to this nothing had been heard of the young men. They were both Rebecos stenior, so probably creathis they had both gone over to the great majority.

"If she left no will their children would

"If she left no will their children would have the money equally; and Arthur's son-supposing he had one—inherit all the land, Isuppose," said the Squire to himself, thought, fally; "but there will be no end of complications. It would be far better if she disposed of her property herself, though I hope she will be spared for many a long day."

Mr. Duncan was standing on the terracetteps when the Squire drove up—a snawe, showed, clear-headed man of business.

Most people had thought is an excellent thing when he obtained the post of Miss Bovington's agent about a year ago.

He managed her affairs ore disably, kept his phoe, and never presumed; but from the first moment of his ceming to Bovington the Squire datested him.

"Give me one thing or the other," he said, it is the contract of the

"Give me one thing or the other," he said, initably, to Miss Rebecca. "Either have a serant whom you can order about, or an equal whom you can treat as a friend. This fellow Dancan is neither. He is not a gentleman; but he considers himself one."

"Gentlemen get rarer every year, Jim 1" retoried the old maid. "He's an excellent man of business and highly recommended."

She patronised him, having even asked him to lunch with her.

The Squire shrugged his shoulders for a time, and said nothing; but when reports of the agent's growing influence reached him he grew farious, and said to his wife,—

"She's perfectly infistuated. I shouldn't wonder if she ended in marrying him."

But Mrs. Thornton, though she did not care for Miss Rebecca as her husband did, would not listen to this disparagement.

"Miss Bovington is not in her dotage, James. Depend upon it she has only taken up this man because you warned her against him. You know she is obstinate."

"I suppose you have spoken to the fellow?" growled the Squire. "I took good care not to allow her to introduce him to me."

"I have never met him," replied Mrs. Thornton. "He came in to lunch on Thursday, when Kitty was spending the day at the day, when Kitty was spending the day at the Manor."

"Then if Kitty had had any self-respect, she would have put down her knife and fork and walked home."

"I was too hangry, dear," put in his daughter, coaxingly. "Besides, you are always exhorting me to be attentive to Miss Boving-

"Hem! What was he like, child?"
"Hem! What was he like, child?"
"Well, he are and drank much like other civilized people; but I should be sorry to see too much of him, and to I told Miss Bovington

"Really, Kitty, you are getting quite sharp. Of course, she asked you why?"

"Yes. I told her I did not know."

"Kitty!"

"Kitty!"
"Well, papa, I don't. At first I thought it was his eyes, they look so pieroing; then afterwards I fanoled it was his mouth, his amile is so creat and calculating."
"And you told Miss Rebecca so?"
"Yes. She did not like it, but she owned he had a very psculiar face. I think he must admire her very much; he never took his eyes off her."

off her."

Mr. Thornton recalled all this as he alighted from the broughers, and saw the agent waiting on the terrace steps. The man came up to him with an elr of well-assumed humility.

"I am afraid there is some mistelse, Equire! Miss Bovingson besself appointed twelve o'clock this merning to sign some leases, but the servant informs me she is ansame."

leases, but the servant informs me she is engaged."

Squire Thornton made no manner of answer. A cholerio and deeply prejudiced old gentleman, he had attadily refused to allow Mr. Denoan to be presented to him, and he was annoyed at the agent's speaking thus unceremonicusty. He rang a peal at the hall door, which was instantly opened by the butler, a staid old family servant, who, in common with all Mies Bovington's retainers, talks absent the Santra's precipities against fully shared the Squire's projudice against common with all Miss Bovingson's remainers, fully shared the Squire's projudice against Andrew Dunean.

"What is that for, Bruce?" asked Mr. Thornton, when, as lie entered, the man oalmly slipped the beast bolt, and so secured the heavy token door against all intruders. Usually it steed open to the hall, where a large fire burned, and whose table was strown with magazines and newspapers to beguile the passing moments.

"It is Miss Bovington's orders, sir," said Bruce, respectfully. "Has Anthony told you what has happened?"

"He told me nothing," answered the Squire, "but he gave me the impression something was the matter, and I must say this barred door looks like is,"

Bruce nodded omineusly.

"I had come from the servants' wing this morning, sir, with the plate-obest in my hand. The women were lighting the fires in the braskfast-room and hall, when Tony came round from the stables. You know, sir, he's one of the oldest servants here—was born on the place, so to say. I saw at once he'd got a friebt, no I took him into my pantry and referred the old maid. "He's an excellent man of business and highly recommended."
"He's a designing scoundrel?" returned the Squire, "and you'll regret the day you and the Squire, "and you'll regret the day you and the Squire, "and you'll regret the day you and hall, whom Tony came round from the stables. You know, air, he's carefully the proven and show her old friend she did not take his opinion in all things, Miss Rebecca professed heavelf very well satisfied with Mr. Duncan.

he stands to it that he found a white horse in the stable."

Squire Thornton did not look as much surprised and dismayed as the butler expected.

"A white horse!" he said, rather in question than in amazement.

"It must have strayed there, I suppose. Miss Bovington never had a white horse. She particularly objects to them" objects to them."

objects to them."

"Sir," said Bruce, almost in a whisper,
"surely being so near a neighbour and such as old friend you knew the reason? A white horse means death or ruin to this family."

"Nonsense!" was the Squire's first reproof.
Then, after a momen's thought, "But I seem to remember something about it. Your mistress will never ait behind a white horse; and I did hear a story of her refueing to put up somebody's carriage because their horseswere white."

"That's it, sir. It's the doom of the Bovingtons—a white horse. Has been for centuries. Why, they say the night before the master died he saw a white horse just outside his window waiting to take him, away."

away.

away."

"But look here, Bruce. Even if one believed in ghosts, which I den't," said the Squire, bravely, though his teeth chattered ominously, "your theory won't work. If Tony saw a white horse in the stable it was a real flesh and blocd quadroped! Anapparition wouldn't come to warn Miss Bovington's cattle!"

"You've not heard all," said Bruce, in a funereal tone. "Just listen, sir. Tony he's as steady as time, never touched a drop of beer for the last ten years, so he can't have been drunk. He went back two minutes after, and the horse was gone."

and the horse was gone."

"Then it is probably in the grounds making have among your mistress's flowers."

Bruce shook his head.

have among your mistress's flowers."

Bruce shook his head.

"Tony he shook just like a leaf, sir, when he told me the story; and I was trying to persuade him to take a drop of brandy just to keep his poor teeth from chattering when Miss Bovington's maid came calling for me. I'm sure, sir, I thought the world was coming to an end. We all know Elizabeth's a worshy oresture, but she's as shiff and starched as a man's collar. Well, sir, she was chaking just like Tony, and she'd told us, me and him, without asking a single question, that she had seen the white horse. When she draw up the blinds in Miss Bovington's dressing-room it-was standing just under the window."

The Squire felt quite unable to combat the butler's superstition any more. He only said, rather resilessly.—

"I hope you have, none of you, told your mistress of this—this fancy?"

"No, sir. We three, Elizabeth, Tony, and me, we made up our minds we'd keep the secret for the credit of the family. But bless me, sir, it wasn't no use. The moment we can appear and maistress we fall she'd sann fix me, sir, it wasn't no use. The moment we set eyes on the mistress we felt she'd seen fi-too."

"And was that why she sent for me?"

"I take it it was, sir," said Bruce, impressively. "When I was clearing away I made bold to remark it was seasonable weather, and would be cheerful for Ohristmas, which comes in three weeks time. Miss Bovington, sir, she just abook her head, and said, gravely, 'I shau't be here then, Bruce.' Why, sir,' I was so taken aback I nearly dropped the salver. But, of course, I knew then she'd seen the white horse."

Poor Squire Thornton was feeling as though

Poor Squire Thornton was feeling as shough he had seen something supernatural himself, so terribly had the news shaken him. When so terribly had the news shaken him. When he reached the pleasant octagon room, where Miss Bovington spent her mornings, he almost dreaded the meeting with his old friend.

To his surprise, Rebecca was not alone. Two gentlemen sat near her. Dr. Botton, the Vicar of the parish, and Claude Maitland, a rising lawyer.

"I thought you would not fail me, Jim," was the old maid's greeting, "I want to make my will, and I wish you to be one of Tony?"

our mised quite ed, with pon the you to wil days we'll all tolder." hut the soul of the condition in 1890.

peet him he had man for ever gave ne never e always eir plans y, the old between sent her as once." alculated ony had ays were here was ly had e, "do y. "I was so ything and in thing, ned to evants the to the hased , and e any rer to same and s, an Vants Male. wing pied had and

Ware Seve

hirty

the executors. Dr. Bolton has promised to be the other."

The Squire stared.

to us Bovingtons—sorrow or death; but that was not the fright I spoke of."

"What was it? You can trust me,

The Squire stared.
"Why, Becky, is's very sudden! I was here esterday, and you never said a word about What is the need for haste?"

"Don't sek questions. Jim," said Miss Bovington, sharply. "Mr. Maitland, please read the will alond to us."

It was very short and simple. The woman whose wealth was so enormous had disposed of her property in very few words. She left handsome legacies to all her servants, hindly remembrances to her closest friends; then remembrances to her closest friends; then Bovington Manor, the coal mine, all her lands, plate, jewels, furniture and money she bequeathed to Mr. Thornton and Dr. Bolton, to hold in trust for the lawful heir of her late cousin, Arthur Bovington. And if it was proved the said Arthur Bovington had left no descendants, then the property was to revert to Vere Thornton, only sen of her friend James Thornton, to have son of her friend, James Thornton, to have and to hold for ever, on the sole condition that he left it intact to his eldest son, who should take the name of Boyington.

"Not a word," said Rebecca, when the Squire began to protest his boy had no claim on her. "Not a word. If Arthur's son has on her. left no child, there is no one I would rather think of as reigning here than your son.

"You forget," said the Squire, "you have another consin—Arthur's brother, Oharlie." "Charles Bovington married a Papist," returned the old mail. "I would rather leave the Manor to found an idiot asylum than that he should come in for is!"

The will was signed, Claude Maitland and his clerk attesting it as witnesses. The lawyer carried it off with him. The Vicar departed. The Squire and his old friend were left

"How do you know that Arthur Bovington married?" he asked, abruptly. "I always thought nothing had been heard of him or his brother since their property was realised and sent out to them."

"I let people think so to save my pride, but I knew the truth. Arthur married on the voyage out, and Charles a year later. You need not blame him," she said, angrily, "for I know all about it, and think he acted nobly. She was a young girl, and her father died on the voyage. She would have been homeless and penniless in a strange land, and so Arthur married her when the ship touched at Cape Town. Poor fellow! he said at least if was his widow he could provide for her fainre.

"He wrote and told me this. He wrote a year later, and said she had died at the birth of her child, a boy, whom he called Walter, after his father. Do you know what my father did, Jim? He suppressed those letters, and I never saw them till I looked through his papers after his death."

"And then it was too late?"

"And then, though I wrote to Melbourne and made inquiries, I could find no trace of my cousins. They had never taken kindly to my cousins. They had never taken kindly to colonial life, and had left Australia very soon after the date of Arthur's last letter. You You may have to search half through the world, Jim, before you discover if your boy is my

"I hope be isn't," said Jim, stoutly. "But, Becky, Walter Bovington would be an elderly man by this time."

"Sixty-three. I'm glad it's done, the will I mean; it is well off my mind."

"But why in the world were you in such a hurry to make it? You never even mentioned it to me yesterday!"
"I had a fright last night, Jim."

"Why, you don't mean to say you saw it too?" gasped the Squire. "On! dear me, what have I said!"

Rebecca Bovington smiled gently; indeed, throughout all the interview her manner had been strangely softened. "You mean the white horse? Yes, I saw it, Jim, and it always means the same thing

Becky."

"Yes," said Miss Bovington, a little grimly, mough i'll have to make a confession I don't much like. But there's nothing petty about you, Jim. You won't go about with a hateful air of triumph, and 'I told you so,' written on your face just because it happens you were right for once."

"What! Have you discovered, something against Dunoan?" oried the Suniza against Duncan?" cried the Squire, with alacrity. "Actually the fellow had the impertinence to tell me there must be something the matter because you refused to see

"I never mentioned Dancan, Jim," said lies Bovington, gently. "Don't let us talk Miss Bovington, gently. "Don't let us about him. I meant something different. have often told me it was not safe for Eliza-nave often told me it was not safe for Elizabeth and me to sleep so far apart from other people. Well, you were right."

"And you have been robbed! My dear Backy, why didn't you say so before? You know I am a magistrate, and in my judicial capacity I should have set the police to work at once. Now I am afraid much valuable ties. at once. Now I am afraid much valuable time has been wasted.

"Oh! Jim," reproved Miss Bovington, "you are nothing but a boy at heart, still I can trust you with my story; but remember, I will not let it go any further. I won't be the laughing stock of the county in my old I was very restless last night, and could sleep. About four some uncontrollable age. I was very restless last night, and could not sleep. About four some uncontrollable impulse led me to the library to seek a book."

"And you met the thieves?"
"I found lights burning in the library, and someone-don't ask me who, Jim-seat my davenport searching through all my pri-vate papers. Just think of it, Jim! To see the most cherished secrets of my life open to the gaze of—of a stranger. Think what I felt at surprising the villain at his tack!"

You ought to have alarmed the house and sent for the police,"

" How like a man!" said Miss Rebecca, reprovingly. "A woman has sharper wise, would sending for the police, restore their old sacred-ness to my poor papers. It would have blazzned my missake abroad. No, Jim. I waited till he had finished and left the house. Then I went back to the library, and, with my own hands destroyed all the letters I had hoarded I only kept back three. The two for years. I received from my cousin Arthur, telling me of his marriage and his boy's birth, and one, dated twenty years later, from an Australian dated twenty years later, from an Australian lawyer, telling me neither Arthur nor Charles Bovington had been seen in Australia since they took passage for England in the steamer Anason. Arthur had his boy with him, and Charles his wife. I will give you these papers, Jim, because they may be of use to you when you have to seek my heir."

"Look here, Booky!" Interposed the Squire.
"I can see you have had a shook and been

"I can see you have had a shook, and been terribly upset. Why not go home with me and stay at The Sycamores for a day or two?"

Miss Bovington shock her head. "Old trees do not bear transplanting," she said, simply, "and I cannot desert the Manor. If you want to do ms a kindness, Jim, you might lend me Kitty, provided her er can spare her ! "

"I'll answer for Lucy," replied the Squire.
"Our little maid shall be with you early in the afternoon."

"And, of course," said Rebecce, cheerfully, "I cannot expose your daughter to any risks; so Bruce and one of the footmen will sleep in our corridor, and my midnight intruder will not find entrance such an easy matter again."

"Booky," said the Squire, suddenly. "Just let me say one thing. If it was Duncan you ought to send him away."

Miss Bovington shook her head.

"I shall answer no questions, Jim. If it was Duncan he will be sent away soon enough, for you are the acting executor to my will, and I can't fancy your continuing to employ "Nonsense, Becky! I don't balieve in hosts. We shall have you amongst us many

"Nonsense, but have you amonges us many ghosts. We shall have you amonges us many years!"

"The token never fails," returned Rebecca,
"A riderless white horse appearing to us Bovingsons means death or sorrow. What sorrow could touch a lonely woman like me, with no near ties? No, Jim, depend upon it is means death!"

Kitty Thornton did not refuse her father's request that she would go over to the Manor prepared to spend some days there. Miss Rebecca had a great fascination for the young girl just entering upon life, and Kitty was by no means averee to the honour of being the first visitor who for more than thirty years had spent a night at the Manor.

She drove over with her maid; for Mr.,
Thornton, who was more timid than her daughter, had absolutely refused her consent to the visit unless Page attended Kitty.

"My dear, they may put you into a damp room, or you may wake in the night and be frightened at the rate! Empty rooms are always haunted by rate. I shall have no peace about you unless Pace is with you."

Miss Rebecca was very pleased to see her guest, and salked so obsertally at dinner that Kitty quite enjoyed the tête-d tête repast. When it was over Miss Bovington said kindly .-

"I generally take a nap in the drawingroom before coffee; but you will find plenty of books and papers in the library, and at eight o clock I shall expect you to come back to

Kitty was so entranced by a new novel she forgot the time; and so it was half-an-hour after eight when she went back to the drawing-

Miss Bovington still slept on; and the girl, unwilling to disturb her, sat down in a low chair by the fire, till Bruce, surprised at not hearing the bell for coffee, brought it in un-

The old servant's eyes saw what had escape Kitty's. The white horse had not appear for nothing—Rebecca Bovington was dead!

(To be continued.)

FROM THE FOOTLIGHTS.

CHAPTER VI .- (continued.)

And so a few days go on, and Netta grows more and more unhappy. She is sure that Bevil has tired of her. On one present or another he spends nearly all his time with his cousins. Netta cannot ride, but surely he could teach her if he liked? She cannot play could teach her if he liked? She cannot play lawn tennis, and it is Millicent who kindly tries to teach her that; but when it comes to a real match Bevil selfishly chooses to play with practiced players, and will not spend his time in helping Netta to spoil the game.

Then another guest comes—a beautiful, high-bred girl, whose face she remembers distinctly—Lady Alexandra des Voeux.

It is in the afternoon. For once, Netta has Bevil all to herself. They have been sitting in the peaceful flower garden amongst the dahlias and the late roses and the strong, sweet mignonette; but with them there has not been peace.

"You seem to care for nothing but running after those girls," Netta has said at the beginning of their conversation. "You treat me as if I was nobody at all."

"You don't understand, Netta," says Bevil, in a moffled tone of exasperated patience. cannot devote myself to you in my own house. I must be civil to everybody."

"It seems to me that you are civil to everybody but me. Bevil frowns. It is marvellous to see what

Nov. a very tair, sim a bis of did see i lover we She thir who alw ing negl votion in publi-Miss Car "Arth Sneyd?

"I be Bevil, on at Colds II Good Kke an patiently t was? trying to upon fin Sneyd, s on has for Bevi been her

when you an inter his face "I de him," N " It was he had naver sp "I me thing I that pu Netta the sees

" It

abrupti some te

They and Be window Nette are soil Bevil light, h that a whom He p "Ib him he ibree d ber bri cars, throat. hardly "Sh maid, longer.

engage letter, self. So There able si a very thunderous frown he can call to his

a very industrials from the can can so his fair, simple face.

Netta does not see it. She is playing with a bit of sweethriar upon her lap, and if she did see it she has not yet learnt to know her lover well enough to read the signs of his face. thinks all men are like Jack Collinson, who always was ready to atone for any sem-ing neglect by a perfectly idiotic amount of derotion as soon as his beloved had deigned to point out his shortcomings.

"I suppose you would like me to kiss you in public as I once saw Arthur Sneyd kiss Miss Carrodus?" he says.

"Arthur Sneyd? When did you see Arthur Sneyd? Lately?" asks Netta, turning very

"I haven't seen him very lately," says

Bevil, oarlessly.

"He did not know Blanche when we were at Coldaby," she says, "so it must have been lately."

"Good heavens, Netta, you catch one up kke an attorney general!" says Bevil, im-patiently. "What matter can it make when patiently. "What matter can it make when it was? I don's keep a diary of those things."

It doesn't make any matter," says Netta, trying to speak carelessly, but determined upon finding out when he last saw Arthur Sneyd, and if her meeting with Jack Collinson has been betrayed. That might account for Bevil's coolness towards her. "He hasn't been here. I suppose you met him in London when you came there just before I came here."
"What in the world makes you take such an interest in Sneyd?" asks Bevil, turning his face round to see Netta's all one crimson been betrayed. That might account il's coolness towards her. "He hasn't blaze of guilt.

"I don't take the very least interest in him," Notta ories, her eyes filling with tears. "It was you who began, and I wondered when hahad got to know Blanche never spoke to her at Coldaby." Blanche so well, for he

"I meant Graham, I suppose, not Sneyd," admits Bevil. "I was thinking about someamits Bovil.

The way in the same into my head."

Note is more frightened than ever when the sees the thunderous frown gather bigger and blacker upon Bevil's brow, but she dares

"It is too cold to sit here," says Bevil, "Come into the house and have

They walk across the lawn in gloomy silence, and Bevil enters the drawing-room by the

Netta goes round by the door, for she wants

Ness goes round by the door, for she wants to take off her hat and wash her hands, which are solled by playing with the sweetbriar.

Beril, going into the soft light—half-twilight, half firelight—of the dressing room, sees that a lady is there, alone with his mother, whom he did not expect to find.

He pauses a moment, and she looks up at him a fair floak daying her shocks.

him, a faint flush dyeing her cheeks.
"I beg your pardon, Lady Alexandra," he says, coming forward. "I had not the slight-

"Had not you?" she says, lightly, giving him her hand. "I have come only for two or three days on my way to the Evertons. How warm is is for Ootober!"

"Yery," says Bevil, absently; thinking how beautiful she looks, with the firelight touching her bright hair, and the tiny gold stude in her oars, and the plain, gold collar round her

Lady Courtenay is saying something, but he hardly bears her.

fardly bears her.

"She is going to be Leila Everton's bridesmaid, you know, so we cannot keep her here longer. I was telling you about Lady Alice's. engagement, Sandra. Stay, I will fetch her letter and the stay of the gagement, Sandra. Stay, I will fetch her tter, and you shall see everything for your-latter, and you shall see everything self. They are all so pleased!"

So Alexandra and Bevil are left alone. There are a few seconds of very uncomfortable silence; each wante to say something care-iess and natural, and neither can think of a word. Bevil blunders out of silence first.

I suppose your own will be the next wed-says, olumsily.

"Mine?" she says, inquiringly, not lifting her eyes from her teacup. The changeful flicker of the red firelight upon her cheek may flicker of the rea meaning colour.
account for her changing colour.
Bevil begins, and stops.

"Heard I was going to be married? To whom?" she asks, with an amused smile, lifting her eyes bravely. To Arthur Sneyd!

"What an idea!" she laughs. "I would as soon think of marrying the man in the moon !

Bevil might be dreadfully disappointed by her answer—he receives it in such moody

She is embarrassed by his silence, and wishes

Lady Courtenay or some one would come in. Some one does come in, so softly, that no one hears her.

Netta has lifted the portiere, which is made of soft, noiseless cloth, and walked a few steps into the room. She sees the two sitting in silence —Alexandra, with her beautiful head drooping over her teacup, as she admires the delicate Dresden landscape on her saucer. Bevil gazing at her, so absorbed in his occupation that he does not see Netta, who is a little to his left.

listle to his left.

"I beg your pardon," Netta says, her voice shrill with jealous anger, for she takes it for granted that they have been sitting in this suggestive silence ever since Bevil went in through the window. "I am afraid I shall disturb you. I had no idea——" and she flounces out of the room.

"Who is it?" Alexandra asks; but she hand who it must be and niv for Bayil over.

knows who it must be, and pity for Bevil over-masters the angry confusion she feels in her beart, "I think I know," she says, gently, trying to make it less painful for him. go and explain—I mean, tell her it was not a secret confabulation that she interrupted. Poor thing! she felt embarrassed, and, of course, surprised at seeing a stranger here."

But Bevil does not obey the gentle mandate. But Devil does not oney the gentle mandate. He leans his arms upon the chimney-piece, and stares moodily at the fire. Alexandra sees that it must be her part to put an end to the awkward position, when Lady Courtenay comes into the room with the letter.

She sees at once something has happened, it she only says.—
"I left Alice's letter in the pocket of one of

"I let's Attoe's lesser in the pooses of one or my gowns, and I could not remember which." Then Bevil, who lifted his arms from the prettily draped chimney-piece on his mother's entrance, and leant his back against it instead, leaves the room abruptly, but not in pursuit leaves the room abruptly, but not in pursuit of his angry betrothed, for he goes out into the dim garden, hardly visible now in the early darkness of the October evening.
"You have not quarreling?" says Lady Courtenay, anxiously, laying down her letter and her pretences.

"Oh, no!" says Sandra, quietly.
"Poor Bevil!" sighs Lady Courtenay. It is quite a genuine sigh, and her eyes fill with Alexandra is going to speak—besitates, and says nothing. She examines the water-lilies on the chimney vallance with intent scrutiny. "Sandra, you see how wretched he is," cries Lady Courtenay. "He feels himself bound to that girl in honour, and he is miserable. There is time to save him now. If he is allowed to marry her is will be too late."

"How is he miserable?" Sandra asks, calmly, still observing the water-lities as if she wanted to impress the pattern upon her mind in order that she may copy it from memory

when she has time. "You know he cares for you, Sandra, and

"Indeed I do not," says Lady Alexandra, "Indeed I do not, says any with gentle dignity. "He gave me no reason to think it, but he has given us every reason to think it has carea for Miss Lovel. Please do not think he cares for Miss Lovel. Please do not fanov such things, dear Lady Courtenay."
"It is not fanoy. I know my boy," eays.

ding shall we hear of, Lady Alexandra?" he | Lady Courtenay. "He has been a changed creature ever since this unfortunate entangle-ment. This girl is a perpetual worry to quietly.

"But you have her here?" Alexandra says.

"Yes, for a reason. My brother advised it," says Lady Courtenay, hurriedly. "Oh! Sandra, help me. You know he loves you—you and not her."

"If that were so, I must go away," she answers; "but I am sure it is not so. Please let us say no more about it. Where are all the girls ? " At a tennis tournament. Miss Lawson-that is Miss Lovel-cannot play tennis. Lady Alexandra smiles, an arch little smile hich Lady Courtenay understands and resents.

"I assure you I had great difficulty in per-suading Bevil to stay at home with her. He adores tennis, and has been as cross as a bear since the morning, when I pursuaded him to I was so anxious for him to meet you in this quiet way. He did not know you were coming. It was a surprise, and I think it has succeeded very well."

Alexandra frowns, and gives her head a little impatient jerk.

ady Coventry changes the conversation. "And what in this about you and Arthur Speyd?

"Nothing. He is going to be married to Mrs. Ramsay, the great railway contractor's widow. I met him at the Durants the other day, and congratulated him."

She blushes a deep red, to Lady Courtenay's immense surprise. She knows she is blushing, for her cheeks are burning and she is vexed, especially at Lady Courtenay's astonishment, d feels she must explain it.

"I was thinking of something he told me," se says, hastily. "Only a bit of idle gossip."

she says, hastily. "Only a bit of idle gossip."
"You don't mean that he told you soundal so bad that you blush at the thought of it, and cannot repeat it?" says Lady Courtenay, severely.
"Oh, no, no, nothing of that sort; only some circumstances that prevent," she stammers: so that Lady Courtenay jumps to a conclusion, all the more easily, because it is one for which she has been easerly on the look-out.

"Something about Miss Lawson?"

Alexandra is so completely overcome with dismay that Lady Courtenay knows her guess was right, or nearly so.

"You must tell me now, or I shall think it is something worse than the trath," she urges,

"It is really nothing," says Sandra, "only that he met Miss Lovel on Hampstead Heath that he met Miss Lovel on Liveye weeks ago.
Of course he magnified the incident, and painted the scene very melodramatically."
"The little treacherous creature! Sandra, you must let me tell Bevil, He ought to

"Oh! pray do not tell him-not from me. Promise me you will not," pleads Alexandra. So Lady Courtenay, with great reluctance, promises to say nothing, "unless Bevil should want an excuse for getting out of his entanglewant an excuse for gesting out of his entangle-ment," she adds in a hurried whisper. And Alexandra has not time to say more, for the girls all come in from their tournament, hungry as hunters, and fresh tea has to be ordered, and Alexandra to be welcomed; and then Bevil comes in to hear about the tennis, to the account of which he listens with his over more Alexandra, and a mondy cloud in eyes upon Alexandra, and a moody cloud in them; and nobody notices that Netta is absent, sulking in her room overhead.

CHAPTER VIL.

"MOTHER, I am going to India to-morrow."

"My dear Bevil!"
Lady Alexandra went a week ago to the Everton wedding. Nesta left this afternoon for London. To-morrow the whole Langdale and Coursenay forces set off for Bootland, carria

No

_

has fe broke anoth Miss maki Sh of Ja frien she i nave:

Th

dish nos Lad into quit

where they are going to stay until the Courternays return to Croxley for Christmas.

"You have broken off your engagement?" Lady Courtenay exclaims, joyfully.
"I have done nothing of the kind, mother,"

Bevil answers, angrily. "I am a gentleman, I hope, and mean to keep my word." Courtenay's heart sinks wearily within her.

within her.

"Are you going to take Miss Lawson to India?" she asks; "or will she go back to the stage during your absence?"

"She will do as she pleases. She does not know yet. I only thought of it on my way back from the station."

Lady Courtensy dares not say another word. Her sabeton has pearly anoseded.

Lady Courtenay dares not say another word. Her scheme has nearly succeeded. She has had Netta brought into close contrast. with other girls, and Bevil has seen the difference between them far more thoroughly than any preaching or word-painting of hers could have shown him; and though he has made spasmodic attempts to hide his feelings, every one in the house has seen that he is utterly weary of his whim. Only Netts has left Whiteliff engaged to him, and there the result is failure.

India is at least a gain. If Bevil carries out his plan there will be no marriage such as she dreads. But she not only dreads the Lovel alliance, but she longs intensely for matters to be settled with Alexandra, who is not likely to wait until he returns from India to pick up his handkerchief when he shall deign to np his handkerchief when he shall deign to throw it. There has been some gossip about the Marquis of Cumbras, who is a more dengerous river than penniless Arthur Sneyd was. Bevil leaves the room suddenly. He has been looking over the Daily Telegraph, which reaches Whiteliff every day, at ten o'clock, and has not spoken again. His mother thinks he has gene to make preparations for India, and Millimms finds her in taxes.

and Millicent finds her in tears.
"Your brother will kill me," she says, weep-"If Cyril were only her eldest, how much happier we should all be! Cyril is rather inclined to be wild, but he is so bid-

Bevil goes to find a Bradehaw. He searches is quickly; then, without a word of explanation; he walks out of the house to the railway station. It is a very quick walk, but he con trives to catch his train at the last minute. It takes him fifty miles in two hours, and deposits him at a station named Lowbury, "Can I have a trap of some kind!" he sake the station master. "I want to go to Oroblam Castle,"

The station-master touches his hat very spectfully to the gentleman who is going to

"That is Lord Lowbury's whitechapel, sir; his lordship got out of the train when you did.'

Which is Lord Lowbury?" asks Bevil, to the station master's surprise and elightly diminished respect. Can this gentlemanly young man be only a lawyer's clerk, or some-thing of that kind come on business?

"The tall old gentleman, sir, in the grey Bevil goes up to him at once "I beg your parden, my lord," he says, "I have not the henour of your acquaintance. My name is Bevil Courtenay, and I shall be greatly obliged if you will give me a seat in your trap as I flad nothing cise is at hand. I have important business with a guest at your house, whom I must see at once,

"Indeed!" says the Earl, much surprised.
"Which of my guests? I believe a whole batch came yesterday, but I was in town.

He speaks suspiciously, and does not move from the step at which he stands to let Bevil mount. He does not take Bevil for a dun, but he wonders if he has come to challenge any of his guests to a duel, he looks so odd, no very much agitated.

"Lady Alexandra des Voorx," saya Bevil. "I am going to India to morrow. I should like to see her, if I may, to say good-bye."
"Oh! jump in!" says Lord Lowbury, cordially, understanding the matter at once; and they drive to the Castle as swiftly as a pair of two hundred-gaines horses will carry

Lord Lewbury is such a kind, genial person that Bevil is led to confide in him at once. He does not tell the whole story. He only says.—

"There has been a misunderstanding be-tween us, and I want to clear it up before setting off to morrow. I saw in the papers this morning that she was at your house, and I suddenly thought I would just try my luck. Of course, this is in strict confidence, my lord. You see there are circumstances that make it almost impossible that I can have a favourable answer, and naturally I should like to keep it all quiet for the present.

When they drive up the avenue, they see a riding party dismounting at the door. It is half-past one.

I think I had better get out here and walk on," says Bevil. "I must see her alone, you know. Can it be managed?" "Yes, get out," say Lord Lowbury, pulling.

up. "She will ge to her room now, most likely, to take off her habit before luncheon. I must to take off her haust merore innoneous. I must tell Lady Lowbury something, you know, and she will arrange things for you."

The Lowburys are so kind, and enter so oordisally into the plot, that after twenty minutes of waiting in her ladyship's morningroom, in which Bevil feels that he has had time to go to India and back, the door opens,

"You!" she cries, recoiling in surprise.
"You!" she says, going forward and taking her forcibly by the hand that she may not run away. "I have come to tell you that I must have you at any price, or I shall fling my orthless life away."
"What do you mean?" she asks, angrily.

"Are you not engaged to be married? Why have you come here?

"Because I am mad, at least, I have been mad-and now I am finding it out. Bave me, Alexandra. Say you will love me, say you will be my wite?"
"I don's understand;" she says, faintly.

"Understand!" he cries, in passionate impatience. "It is easy enough to understand. I have made a fool of myself, as many other men have done. I never loved a won you and I never shall."

"And you come to say this to me while you are engaged to another woman?" she says,

"Alexandra; have you never heard of men "Alexandra; have you never hears or men who have been rulned for ever by such a missake as I have raade?" He says, earnestly, his wrath having subsided, "because they have not found it out in time? I have found mine out in time. Shall a mistaken sense of honour hold me back from setting things right?"

"And what about Miss Lovel's feelings?" Alexandra asks. "Are they not to be considered?"

"Miss Lovel's heart is not fixed upon me." hie sava.

"No, it is not," says Alexandra, impulsively, and then she colours, feeling horribly

She knows Neita is false to him. Why, then; should she and Bevil be sacrificed for Netta's sake? If this ill assorted marriage is consummated, how will it end? Probably as so many others of the kind have done, in disgrace and misery.

And there is time to save him, and she can do it, and yet it is so difficult to bend her outraged pride. She has been very unhappy lately; she knows she loves Bevil with all her hears, and that life will be hardly bearable without bim.

"Well, what shall I do? Go to India to morrow, to marry a nautch-girl or to be eaten by a tiger, or go to a register office and marry Miss Lovel? It is for you to decide. I place my life in your hands!"

"On! this is ordel!" she ories, weakly.
"You are lost!" he exclaims, triumphantly.
"When a woman hesitates she is lost. You love me, or you would not hesitate. Is a man never to be forgiven one act of folly? Will you not forgive me, though you love me? You know you love me!"

Then he takes her into his arms, and she makes but faint resistance.

"You are mine, my very own," he whispers, but as he bends his lips to here she wrenches herself away.

"No, no !" she protests. "I am not your own yet. You still belong to her. You must not kiss us both !"

She flushes searlet as she speaks,
"But you love me!" he repeaks, in his sur-

"Yes; let that do for the present; You must be off with the old love before you are on with the new. I do not wish to be mentioned in a breach of promise." She would never dare ! " cries Bevil.

"You cannot trust her and her friends, No, no! I can say no more to day, perhaps I ahould not have said so much. When you should not have said so much. When you are off with your old love you may come

And that is all he can persuade her to say, and he returns to Whiteliff that evening.

"I am not going to India, mother," he says, coming to her with a face full of radiant happiness. "I am going to London by the night train."

"You are going to marry that wretched girl!" ories Lady Courtenay, off her guard in her sudden disappointment.

Ail day long she has been rejoicing over the idea of India. Anything is better than that wretched marriage; and she has given up all hope of Alexandra, since somebody this afternoon confirmed the news of her engagement to Lord Cumbrae.

"Bevil, she does not care for you. She carries on a clandestine flirtation with an old lover. Arthur Sneyd saw them. Alexandra des Vœux told me."

"Alexandra I" exclaims Bevil.

"Yes. I promised not to tell, but I must," and Lady Coursensy does tell the story, though she feels she may be ruining Alexandra's cause for ever, not knowing what has happened. Bevil listens in silence. Here, at least, is a decent pretext for breaking off his engagement. How generous of Alexandra not to tell him! He writes that night to Nette, gives her his club address; and in the morning he sets off with his family for the north.

He knows that much awkwardness may come of the matter, but his father will willingly pay any amount of damages rather than let it go on; and even if he should have to submit to the anneyance of a law case there is Alexandra for a prize at the end.

CHAPTER VIII.

NETTA leaves Whitcliff with a weary dissatisfaction in her heart, "What is it all worth?" she thinks: "If my married life is to be years and years of the misery of there last few days it is not worth having

But the farther she travels from Whitchiff and Lady Courtenay, who is so cold and distant, and Bevil, who is such an unlownlike lover, and all those girls whose ways and manners are not as her ways and manners, the more the good things of her lot come into the foreground.

She would have to toll up many weary degrees of the ladder of theatrical snecess beregrees or the ladder of theatrical success before she could expect to stay at such a house as Rock Lodge, and meet such people as Lady Langdale and Lady Alexandra on even apparent terms of equality—even before the could wear such clothes as she wears at this moment, and travel first-class, with the conteiousness of luggage enough in the van behind her to inspire any railway porter with obsequious respect.

She would not like to give up these good things. She would not like to go back to her old life, her shabby dresses, the third class 1890)

a man ? Will te? You and she hispart,

of your his sur-

b; You are or rienda.

chaps I

to say,

e says, adiant

by the etched guard er the

that up all after-ement

She

n old tory,

, is a

gage-of to etta, ning may will

DARO

dig-and like

ers, nio

the

carriages, the weary treadmill existence she has left, whose monotony seems to have been hoten only by the doubtfulness of getting another modest engagement; the society of Miss Standish and Miss Carrodus; the warmer, but, of course, more vulgar love-making of Jack Collinson.

She sighs at the last. She wearvery fond of Jack and she would like to have him for a friend still. He was very fond of her, and he is quite sure his heart is broken. He will saver one for anyone else.

never care for anyone else.

Then as she gets out of the train at Victoria the first person she sees is Miss Edith Stan-

Netta's first impulse is to pretend she does Nessa sirst impulse is objected and objected and contens in two lady Courtenay's guest should go straight into the society of a third-rate actress after quiting the society of ladies of rank; but her second impulse is to hurry after Edith. She does so want to hear all about the company—

"Dear me!" Miss Standish exclaims, on "Dear me!" miss standard evisions, diding herself accosted by this elegant lady, in her irreproachable travelling costume. "Wonders will never cease! Is it actually you and do you condescend to speak to a poor thing like me after the grand company you have been in? I am honoured!"

Ohlehe can never go back to spend her life with Miss Edith Standish and such as she; but she says, pleasantly,-

"I am so glad to meet an old friend. Will you come and have some tea with me? I was so much to hear all about you."

Miss Standish is nothing loth. She is lighted to have an opportunity of hearing what Netta has been doing, though, at the same time, she is vexed to give her the opportunity of narrating her adventures.

Netta leaves her luggage to be called for,

and they go to a shop to have some sea.

"And when is your wedding coming off?"
Miss Standish asks, when they are left

"It is not fixed yet," saya Nette. "Don't talk about me. I want to hear all about you?"
"Has something gone wrong?" asks Miss Stanish carbonsly. "Didn't you get on with the grandees ? "

"Nothing has gone wrong," says Netta, thisking that in case of accidents it would be better to prepare Miss Standish's mind, so that she shall not be ready to say that Netta, has been jilted and held up to ridionic, "I den't know that I am very auxions for its-that's all. I would rather go back to see stage if I could. It's a very dull kind of life with those grand-people."

Miss Standish does not in the least-believe-her; but she does not forget the words.

Nette goos on,-"Are you acting at present? Where is Blanche Carrodus; and do you hear anything of Mrs. Hope?"

"No, nothing. Jack and I are at the Amany?"

She fires a little quick, conscious glance at Netts, and it is like a spark put to a train of sunpowder, taking immediate effect.

Instanty, Bevil and his favore title, and the present good things that come from him, become of no account at all compared with Jack.

She does not deign to ask Miss Standish what that meaning glance is intended to convey; but she resolves that she, run what risk she may, will assure herself that Jack cares for her only, and not Miss Standish.

She has nothing definite in her mind as to what she will do with his love, should it still be here; but she is very certain that Miss Standish shall not have it.

"Where are you lodging?" she asks, when they pare.

"At ten, Meredith street, beside the ibeare," says Edial.
"Did you say Blanche was with you?"
"No: I said nothing of the kind. There's only Jack with me, and he doesn't lodge in the same house with me yet," she says, laughing; but she does not give Netta Jack's address.

Miss Bell is in wild excitement when Netta goes home, and is much disappointed when she sees how dull the girl looks, and how little she has to say.

"I hope nothing is going wrong?" she thinks, and she calculates what compensation must be her share of the damages, should something go wrong.

Netta goes to her room and shuts herself in, saying she has a letter to write that must be posted to-night.

This looks well, Miss Bell thinks, and comforts herself with a novel, while Netta is writing her letter.

At last she hears her come out of her room; but, to Aunt Charlotte's surprise, she goes downstairs and out of the house.
"This is queer!" Miss Bell' muses; but before she has had time to wonder much.

Netta returns.

"You have been out?" says Miss Bell, interrogatively.

"Yes; I went to post a letter at the pillar outside."

The letter is not addressed to Bevil Courte-nay but to Mr. John Collinson, Albany Theatre, Strand.

It is not very long, though it has taken so much time to write it; and Netta's stock of grey repp paper is very sensibly diminished.

"Dear Old Friesd," it begins.

"I want so much to see you. I am unhappy, and in need of advice. I think I have made a mistake in life, and you must help meto get out of it. Unequal marsiages can never lead to happiness. Tell me where to meet you to-morrow. Don't come here.—Yours. you to-morrow. Don " NETTA."

When she wrote it, she had not the faintest intention of giving up Bevil Courtenay, should her old "friend" advisate over so strongly. She only wanted to puzzle Jack, to tempt him to come to her, then to warn him against Miss Edith Standish, and to chain him for ever-more to her own side, as guide, philosopher more to her own side, as guide, pantosopies and friend, of course, and reind, of course, She thought her letter was very cleverly constructed, and really committed her to nothing. The "mistake" might not necessarily be the marriage-itself, but only an accidence connected with it. Then she sits down by the fire, and tells Miss Bell everything that can be said about Whiteliff. told about Whiteliff.

She stays in all the next day, waiting for the post or for some message from Jack, but he makes no sign; the long hours go by. The hourly succession of countless footsteps passes the house, the postman comes five times along the row, but he brings nothing for her, until the night comes and goes, and with the morning he brings Bevil's letter—nothing more. It is a terrible shock, in spite of all the has feared and thought, and planned against. She forgets everything, except the title and positionshe has lost; her constant humiliation at Whiteliff, to find that Bevil liked being with those other girls better then with her; her jealous drand of Lady Alexandra; her sorrow-ful regress for the old-love and the old life. Miss Bell watches her while she reads the

"He-he's jilted you," she ories at the sight of Netta's anary, white face. The horrible word strikes home! Jilted!

How they will all oncer and triumph—Miss. Standish, Miss Carrodus, and all of them; Jack, tee, he will net say much, but he will think all the more. Perhaps he knew some-thing of it, had some reason for expecting it, and that is why he holds her so chasply now. He thinks she is hedging, as they say about beiting, trying to make sure of him failing Bevil. "I den't care two miraws for him," she says to her aunt, meaning the man who has jilted her; "but he will make other people despise me. No one will care for me now."

"Well, Netta," says Aunt Charlotte, "to tell the truth, I have been expecting it all along, but if you mean no one else will, marry you; you need not be afraid. Such damages you; you need not be afraid. Such damages, as you will get will make quite an heiress of you at once. Besides, any manager will jump at engaging you now. You can command your salary; you will be a celebrity!"

"Damagea! "Netta repeats, horrified.
"Of course you must make him pay for it."
says Aunt Charlotte. "You must not be queemish. You cannot afford it. Think how much he has cost you, your salary, and mine too?"

"Oh! I cannot," and Netia bursts into-tears. She is foreaken all round. Where is Jack? Why has he not answered her letter? Has she not a friend in the world?

She cries all night and next morning. She is really ill, to Aunt Charlotte's great satisfac-

"It will be so much better for the damages," she thinks, and, without telling Netts, she puts on her bonnet and goes to say a solicitor.

The solicitor is delighted with the aspect of the case.

"We shall ask for fifty thousand damages, and we shall get thirty as least 1" Then Miss Bell goes back to South Kensington, and tells Netta what she has done.

"Thirty thousand pounds!" Netta repeats.
That certainly would be some compensation; crass certainty would be some compensation; for since her aunt has left her this morning she has remembered that the very rooms they, are in, and the food they est, and the clothes she is wearing are of Bevil's providing, and must be given up; and she has no money to go on with except two pounds. Jack has made no sign. It is cruel of him to forsake her thus.

her thus. Then she thinks that perhaps he has not got her letter. It was addressed to the theatre, and Miss Standish may have intercepted it— or he-may be very ill—or the pillar may not have been cleared. Such strange accidents sometimes befal letters.

Her anger against him cools down, and ale, feels that even thirty thousand, or even fifty thousand, or all the world, would not compensate her for the loss of him.

She must find out whether bringing the action would alienate him from her for ever. or whether he would think it only a just vengeance upon Bavil Courtenay, and the damages only a desirable contribution to the joint housekeeping of himself and Netta,

She cannot go to meet him as the theatre, for she would be recognised at least by Edita Standish. She must find out his address, and beard the lion in his den.

"I must go out for some fresh air," she says to Miss Bell, having heard all she has to say, and all that Mr. Kirke, the solicitor, said, and all that Bevil and his people are likely to say, and all that the world will say. "Do you think you could get me the last Era I I want to see the advertisements before I go out. I shall have to find a new engagement,

"There's no hurry," says Aunt Charlotte.
"It will look much better if you are obliged to keep your room. Now it you would only go to bed!"

Netta is too impatient to argue. She puis on a long, dark cloak, and ties a thick veil over her face.

"Everyone will think I am in bed all the same," she says, "for no one will recognize me in this."

Then she goes out, stops an oranibus, and is taken to the Strand.

She gets out at a coffee house largely patronised by the theatrical profession. She orders tea and a steak in a private room.

"It doesn't look like being much damaged having such a good appeare," she thinks; "but I must not let myself he tired and hungry, or my brain won's work."

Then she asks for the Era, and cauches the advertisement columns while she waits for ing or otherwise, but the address of Mr. John

She has hardly patience to cat the steak, which she accomplishes with her veil half raised, so that, being consequently doubled, it looks like a mask, and arouses the curiosity of the house, who are not accustomed to ladies so chary of exhibiting their faces. At last she has finished her repast, and paid for it—one of Bevil's money—and she is off.

She flads the house easily. It is quite close at hand. Mr. Collinson is not at home, but she says she will wait. She has to see him important business. The landlady is doubtful, but Netta looks 1) adylike in spite of the mystery of her veil, that she is admitted and shown into the dirty tobacco and beer and brandy-scented apartment serves Mr. Collinson for drawing rodining room, bedroom and dressing room. drawing room,

It is six o'clock. He is sure to come before going to the theatre to see if there are any letters, if for nothing more,

Nessa establishes herself as comfortably as possible in a greasy arm-chair, and prepares to wait.

"I'll just look at his things," she says to herself, and goes to the table to begin her inspection; but the door suddenly opens, and heart jumps with a violence that nearly makes her faint.

It is only the servant, whom the landlady has told to "keep her eye" upon the stranger. The maiden, unable through the door to obey literally, has kept her car upon her, and at the first sound of a movement bounces into the room to see what the veiled lady is Netta understands quite well.

'You need not be afraid of me," she says the abashed girl. "I don't want to steal to the abashed girl. anything. Is Mr. Collinson quite well, and has be been at home every day lately?"

the lesser may have miscarried. Here in Jack's own room him, as if she had gone back to the old life they had in common, and Bayil and Wnitcliff are not the unrealities.

She is quite sure that when Jack comes in and sees her he will forget her desertion, and be ready to take her to his heart again.

"You can stay here," she says to the ser-"I want to hear about Mr. Collinson. It is dull waiting alone, and, besides, you will see that I don't help myself to his valuable properties," she adds, laughing.

She gives the girl half-a orown, and asks er when Mr. Collinson usually comes in, and if he comes in alone,

"If anyone comes in the house with him now I will give you another half-a-crown to keep them out, and let him come into the room alone.

"Are you his sister, miss?" asks the girl.
"No, only a friend—a very old friend."
"You're going to be married to him, likely?" "I don't know. You are very impudent." says Netta, angrily; then she remembers that the girl is a useful ally, so she says, nervously, "Why do you think I am going to be married to him? Is there any talk of that kind about

She blushes so hotly that she is obliged to put up her veil, and the girl sees her pretty young face at last, and is drawn into further

"They do talk about him and Miss Standish, miss," she says. "I thought you was her at first." confidence.

She is amply repaid for her news by seeing so angry flash in Netta's eyes, and the the angry flash in Netta's eyes, and the the angry flash in Netta's eyes, and the indignant stiffening of her small figure. "That is all nonsense!" she says, in the heat and haste of her jealous rage. "He is going to marry me. We had a quarrel, but it is all right again, or do you think I would do such a thing as come to his lodgings?" she asks, severely virtuous,

"Miss S:andish has been sometimes," says the girl, and then flies to answer a bell, promising to return.

Notta, left alone with her jealousy, paces the room like a young caged panther. is he now? Why does he not come in? She vows she will not leave the house until she es him, and has everything explained.

He can know nothing yet about the disastrons end of her engagement. She will not tell him until she has made sure that his love is till hers. Oh! when will he come in?

Eight o'clock strikes. No chance of him now until after the play. It is a wrong thing to do, she knows, but she is playing for a stake for which it seems worth while to risk every-

She will wait till he comes in. make sure of him before he hears that she has been cast aside by her rich lover.

How long the hours are! She does her best to make them pass by, reading the newspapers that she flads lying about, and by talking to servant.

After all, it is very unlikely that he will come home the moment he is out of the theatre, or that he will come in alone.

Jane, the servant, says there are nearly always some other gentlemen with him, and sometimes he has ladies to supper as well.

She waits, and then sees she must give up for the present. It is ten o'clock. She is awfully tired, and she is sure that she will not have the opportunity she wante,

Before she goes she will take one more look round to see if she can find any trace of her

If it has been received, and left unanswered, she will give up the game. She has not dared yet to look through the heap of letters and bills beside the inketand lest she should be suspected by Jane and the landlady of dishonest purposes; but now, being desperate, she says to Jane,

I want to look through those papers to see if there is a letter of mine there. You can watch me; and then, if anything should be lost, you will know it was not I who stole it.

Jane makes no objection; and Netta, with a heart beating afresh and faster, begins her

Letters in unknown handwritings, memo randa, bills, advertisements—she goes through

She does not find her own grey repp pa Such ladies as have corresponded with Mr. Collinson have used paper of every other possible colour and quality.

She remembers her own perfectly, so she hardly glances at the others, until she comes to a torn fragment of white notepaper covered with Jack s own cramped writing.

With Jack s own cramped writing.

She would pass it over too, only she sees her own name, and she takes it out of the pile, and reads it.

" MY DARLING NETTA," it begins.

"You have injured me cruelly. You have nearly spoilt my life; but I believe you are penitent, and that your real love having never been given away from me we may still be happy if you have courage to throw off the chains that bind you.

"I understand your little note, darling. I have this moment received it; and, 'in spite of all,' as you say, I am ready to forgive, and I will be wish you in the morning.

"You were dazzled by rank and wealth, and you are so young, I must not be hard upon My love can never change, and I know

Here the fragment breaks off. Netta does not pause to ask why. Her brain is whiching with joy. Probably his letter was interrupted, and then lest, and his complete one has been delayed somehow. It is so late ahe has not time to think. She takes paper, pen and ink, and writer.

"24, Adelphi-terrace, "October 20 h, 1884.

" MY OWN JACK,

"I have found your letter, and I am so happy. I never loved any one but you, and I never mean to marry anyone else. I care nothing for titles and money, only for love.

Money is rubbish, and love is everything. Come to me in the morning. I have been miserable, and now I am so happy. "Your loving wife

She seals the letter, puts it in a conspicuous position on the chimney-piece, gives Jane five shillings in the fulness of her joy, and

CHAPTER IX

" LAWSON V. COURTEMAY."

The case comes on, after all.
'Fifty thousand certain," says Netta's friends, but the other side says little; they keep so quiet that Mr. Kirke is uneasy.
"They have something behind," he says,

"or they would make a compromise rather than bring it into court. Sir Robert would not mind paying a good sum down to be out of it.

Netta excites universal sympathy. She has been gleaning a harvest since her return to the stage as far as salary goes, and the sale of her photographs has equalled that of any other competitor; but all the time she looks weary and sad, the ideal of a foreaken nymph, and the public think she is breaking her heart, and are of opinion that a hundred thousand pounds would be small compensation for her

When she comes into the witness-box she is pale and thin, a very "broken flower," and it is whispered that she is much averse to bringing on the action, but has been prevailed upon by her relatives. She gives her evidence quietly and firmly, and then thinks she has nothing to do but leave the court with the silent but tearfal sympathy of the court, when Sir Charles Pollen, Bevil's counsel, poances upon her.

"You are acquainted with Mr. John Collinson, are you not? You have acted in the same company very frequently, I believe?" Netta colours, but answers "yes" quietly.

"You and he were on very intimate terms before you met the defendant, were you not?"

"Not particularly," says Netta, losing

"Please to remember you are on your oath," says Sir Charles, sternly, and all the colour fades out of Netta's face. "Were you not engaged to be married to him?"
"Never!"

"But you were lovers, 'keeping company,' were you not? You used to go out walking with him?

Netta admits the walks. "And since your supposed engagement with Mr. Courtenay have you or have you not walked alone with Mr. Collinson on Hamp-stead Heath?"

That was nothing !" Netta ans "That is for the jury to decide, Mise Law-son. Did you or did you not walk with him on Hampstead Heath on the 22nd of Septam-ber last?"

"Yes, I believe I did-yes, I did," Netta says, defiantly,

"While Mr. Courtenay was absent from

"Yes; but he came that night."
"And you told him about your morning's

"No. There was no occasion. It was 'Are these letters in your writing?

Two letters are handed to Netta—the greepp note she sent to Jack, which was not -she grey repp nose see sent to seek, which was never answered, except by the fragment she found — the hurried, heedless lines she wrote at his lodgings, with date and address, which had been answered by two or three lines, very severe, and much to the purpose.

"Yes," the says, colouring, and thinking
Jack need not have kept her letters, and then given them up, though she does not under-stand the bearing they have upon her case.

"That With a to Nesta Miss Be whom sh Hope, an w Mr. B Then admits t that he plainsiff preferred do bis

Nov.

Then swears to ing his finally libing fr pose. ohimne wrote i

O GAVA Jane is very Edia fession ibe m from which

Conrte rather Thi

Note her for a into leti day 8bc Ale

ything. een Bo

TTA."

icuone ne five and otta's

they says, rould

n to ther

sary

and her ng-pon

the

ng

"Thank you, that will do," says Sir Charles, with a triumphant smile, Nesta's witnesses are all useful enough. Miss Bell, the manager of the theatre with Miss Bell, the manager of the theatre with whom she broke her engagement, Mrs. Julius Hope, and others. There is no donot that she was formally and fast, engaged to be married to Mr. Bevil Courtenay.

Then Bevil comes into the witness box, admits the promise of marriage, but declares that he was justified in breaking it, because the shelf did not want to marry him.

plaintiff did not want to marry him, as she preferred someone else—Mr. John Collinson.

Then Bevil's witnesses are called, and three do his work for him—John Collinson, who swars to the lester that came by post, which he had at first thought of answering by renewable of the collinson. ing his offer of marriage, but which he had heally left unanswered, having heard some-thing from Miss Standish that made him susthing from Miss Dandish since made that sup-pleions of Miss Lawson's singleness of pur-pose. The second letter he had found on his chimney piece, and had been told that a lady wrote it who had waited in his room from syen c'clock till half-past ten on the evening of October 20th 1884

Jane Witners, domestic servant, corrobo-rated this evidence, and adds her own, which is very telling.

Edith Swith, known in the theatrical protission as Edith Standish, tells the court how the met the plaintiff the day she returned how visiting Lady Courtenay at Whitoliff, which was two days before she received Mr. Contensy's letter, and that Miss Lawson looked out of spirits, and said that she was not very anxious for the marriage, and would mibrigo back to the stage.

This is considered sufficient. It is impossible to consider a lady's feelings or prospects to have been very much injured in the face

The jury, with a minute's consultation, give this verdict in accordance with the judge's suming up, and the unanimous feeling of the public.—
"For the plaintiff. Damages, one shilling !"

So Jack is avenged, and Bevil is free, and letta has to make her hay while the sun of he notoriety shines, by drawing big houses for a few weeks, after which she must subside

int low weeks, after which she must subside into obscurity once more.

For Aunt Charlotte is really the most injured one, and she has a great deal of difficulty in meeting with another situation, as the share of fame that has come to her through

Note is not of advantage to a governess.

Real fear of starvation impels her to write a little to Lady Alexandra Courtenay on the day that her wedding is recorded in the papers. She merely asks for a recommendation; but Alexandra understands, and represents to her hashand that, as he has got off very easily so lar, he might take poor Miss Bell's claim into on he might take poor miss belt so used into modification, seeing that he was the sole intigator of her giving up her situation.

He agrees with his two days' bride, and that Miss Bell a very munificent present, which he trusts she will accept for old friend. ship's sake; but Lady Alexandra does not think that she would be quite justified in recommending Miss Bell as an instructress of

"All's well that ends well !" says Miss Bell, pocketing her cheque.

[THE END]

During the revolution in France between 1788 and 1794 over one million of human 1788 and 1794 over one million of human beings were put to death by the guillotine and otherwise. The bodies of the guillotined in Paris were skinned, and the skins tanned, and chiefly used for making leather breeches and straps for the soldiers. Female skins, being thinner, were principally used for making gloves. Napoleon the First discouraged this gressome practice.

WITHOUT A REFERENCE.

CHAPTER XXX.

Wzne Miss Parr to place the matter in a lawyer's hands, where were her proofs? and where was her money? She had one hundred and fifty pounds; but if a detective was sent out to India to look into matters that had bappened twenty years previously one hundred and fifty pounds would not go far.

There was Roger, but Roger would be a bad detective; he was so open, so impetuous, so rash; and, moreover, how could he get

She must depend upon herself, as she had often done before. Mr. Paske must have some valuerable point; the rhinoceros could be killed in one place, a small one it was true—the eye; Mr. Paske might be tripped up and caught by means of his old chum, Mr.

And now she was tired of this long waiting on events. Everything does not come to those who wait; when it does arrive it is generally too late for them to enjoy it. She would strike a bold stroke, and take the consequences; the would precipitate matters.

The two friends were going to spend the evening in the smoking room. It was chiffy evening in the smoking-room. It was chiffy enough now at the end of September. The windows were closed, the curtains drawn. Why should she not conceal herself behind the curtains of the deep bay window, and listen to their conversation?

She would glean more in that way in a night than she would pick up from chance "talks" with Mr. Horne in months.

No sconer thought of than done. She slipped down the passage, and down four steps, and found the door of the smoking room It looked bright and comfortable sjar. It looked brigges and countries, when candles, arm-chairs, and a nice fire, in front of which was drawn up a rmall table, with a case of spirits and a box of cigars. It all looked very snug indeed—just the place for a confidential interview!

Sara had barely time to get behind the window curtains when she heard Mr. Horne's window curtains when she heard Mr. Horne's loud voice in the passage outside.

"This is something like!" said Mr. Horne, cheerily, as he threw himself into an armchair, and stretched out his legs. "Pon my word, Mr. P., you have not made a bad thing of it! Now, have you?"

"Nor you; and by Jove, you have six to four the best of it," said the other, drawing nn a chair.

out she best of a, up a chair.

"Now, I'd like to know how you make that out?" said Mr. Horne, lighting a cigar.

"You, with your town bouse, your country place, your men-servants and maid-servants, your wife with her diamonds, your stepdaughter with her airs, your own—"
" Stop; leave Amy out of the list!" said

Mr. Paske, sharply.

"Well, with all these items, and plenty of money at your bankers, you are a happy prosperous man. What more do you want? Whilst I—I am a sort of loafer without a home, that lives in lodgings, and on whatever you give him!"

"You are a precious expensive loafer, I can tell you, Charlie Horne. I've paid you in one way or another twelve hundred within two months."

"And what's that to a man with five

"And what's that to a man with five thousand a year?"
"Five thousand a year, that gives me precious little pleasure. Do you think I care for a carriage and horses, and giving big balls and dinners to people who don't care twopence about us and would out us if we had no coin. I loathe it all—hate it! My wife spends, Miss Pontifex spends, the servants spend, you spend! I am only the paymaster—that's my part—and supposed to be my pleasure! I often wish I just had a little place, and a bit of a garden, and a pipe, and say a hundred a year, and peace."

"You used not to think that in Port Augusta long ago. You were all for going out in the world, and making a great stir and a great name, and being a very fine fellow. You were ambitious, Mr. P., even in short jackets —ambitious of money and power, and to get them with as little personal trouble as possible; and—and—by Jove—"blowing a cloud of tobacco into the air—"you did. You get your wish !"

So you think. I pulled the chestnuts out of the fire, and you are them, my friend !"

"True, and so did you. You have had a very good time this last twenty years, have

"Yes, I suppose so!" he admitted, reluctantly.

"Suppose wo! Better than making a few rupees on some desolate mountain tea estate in India, or on some desolate 'run' up country at home. You always were a gambler, even as a brat of a boy, I ve heard, and you threw for a big stake and collared is."

for a big stake and collared it."

"And played no more. Now you go on gambling still, and some day you will rain me, and the whole thing will burst up. I have always expected it."

"And if it does, what a comedown for Miss Pontifex! You have spoiled that girl—woman, I mean. She has had her head turned."

"Not II She has it in the blood. She was "Not I! She has it in the blood. She was orn so!"

"To night she looked as if she would like to have my blood, as if she would bite me!"
"She is all bark, no bite!" said Mr Paske, with a faint attempt at wit. "When do you think of going back to Australia, Charlie, my

Oh, I don't know!"

"Way, you talked of this autumn?"
Did I? Well, it was only talk!"

"Did I? Well, it was only talk !"
"And yet you say the life over here is slow, and you are sick of it, and long for Australia, dampers, and old chums, and watch

"Oh, you want to get rid of me !"

"Come, silence gives consent! Speak out your mind!"

"Well, to be as plain spoken as you are, I do. People wonder why you are always hanging about me. They will begin to suspect. My wite and family don't fanoy you!"
"No," with a loud guffaw. "Anyone can see that!"

"And I am always in fear of your letting fall some word that may do misohief."
"I am safe enough. Have I not been mum for twenty years? I am as safe as a church!"
"Yes! but I have a queer presentiment of evil. Whether it is that my liver is out of order or what I don't know; but I feel ill and depressed. You know that girl would not stay in the convent and souted the action of taking the veil. She has come home."

"Good gracious! You don't mean it!"

atarting up.
"Yes, I do. I did all I could to keep her in Calcutte, I stopped her allowance. However, she made her way to London. She weat to Dombey and Son, and wanted my address. She is a very determined piece of goods!"

"The dence she did!"

"And, of course, I told them not to notice

" And is that all?"

"No; not long ago I had a visit—it was last January—from a Mrs. Hyde, a friend of hers. She wanted me to acknowledge her as my daughter, and produce her certificate of birth, and all that sort of thing."
"Why?"

"Because she was about to marry—to marry well, and the man naturally wanted to know who she was, and who her people were?"
"Yes, and were you equal to the occasion?"
"I think so. I said she was a station.

master's daughter, and her name was Shandy. I had had her educated out of charity, and had done a great deal for her. I tent her ten pounds, and advised her to go into service, for I would have nothing more to do with her, with !

No

Pask

had a

had o a pie out o down

he 400

in D

in D in () he w not of guilti crim

ms, He but を なり田田の

田福北

as she had come to England against my

"Haw, baw, haw! What a cool card you are, James! No taking you aback! Catch a weasel asleep. Tan pounds out of five thousand a year—all her own money! Well, that's a good joke!"

Hash, you idiot ! Walls have ears!" " Not in an old house like this, my friend! How nervous you are, and you certainly are looking very seedy. Is it true you take oblaval? It is a bad habit, you know?" looking very seedy. Is it true chloral? It's a bad habit, you know

"Yes; but I am obliged to. I sleep so

"Sarely you have got over that by this "Barely you have got over that by this time?" with another horse laugh. "Do you have bad dreams?"
"I tell you I can't sleep. It's constitutional, the doctor says, and it's uncommonly Toe deator says! What does he know?

Constitutional ! Oh, my eye !"
"Well, and about Australia?"

"Yes, and what about it?" in a sleepy voice. "What will you take to go back? You must see it does not do, your hanging about. mast see it does not do, your hanging about.

My wife often wonders I put up with your insolence; and she has been himing that you have a hold over me, and levy blackmail, and it's not very pleasant."

"Blackmail is an ngly word," using an cath. "What would use call appropriating five thousand a year for twenty years, ch? One kundred thousand pounds! That's semathing like a sum, and worse than any amount of blackmail. It's downright high-

"B'ackmail or not, what will you take to to go and never come back?

"Ten thousand pounds down on the nail,

Ten thousand! Say a hundred whilst you are about it." said Mr. Paske, sarcastically, "No," doggedly. "I say ten and stick to "No," doggedly. "I say ton and name to ten, no more and no less. I may take more!" "And where am I to get ten thousand pounds? You know very well the estate is tied up. I cannot tonch a shilling of the capital, and never could."

"And a good job too! It would have been gone long ago. You can insure your life, and raise it in that way."

"I think five are as much as I can give you."

"Then I advise you to think again, for I won's budge under ten," said Mr. Horne, with much resolution in his tone.

"Horne, do you know that sometimes I feel as if I could murder you?"

"I daresay. It is not the first time you have had that feeling about a man; but you won't do it as you did before for I am always armed, with this very nice pooket revolver!

Sara peeped out cautiously with just one Mr. Horne had a glass of highly coloured whisky in one hand, and a revolver that he was gazing at affectionately in the other. Paske was lying back in the chair, an extinguished oigar between his lips, surveying with a look of absolutely murderous hate.

Well, I suppose you must get it," he said "Well, I suppose you must get at," he saw after a pause. "Any sacrifice to get rid of you. I dareeay I'll manage it by the end of the month, and then I ll hand you over the money, and you will hand me over the papers." papers

What papers?" said the other, coolly. "Don's present you don't understand, and don's be a fool! Why the papers—the mar-riage certificates, her birth certificate, her riage certificates, her birth certificate, her letters, all the things in that brown leather poetfolic that you etole!"

"Yes, I certainly did steal them—they represent my bread and cheese. Do you think that if I had not cribbed them I would ever have been able to have squeezed a shilling from you? No, James, I knew you for a hard, soluming man, that lets nothing etand in your way when you have an end to gain. You would have pushed me aside, down into the gutter. It would be only your word against mine, and you a rich man and I a poor one. An impostor, you would have said; but luckily I have the proofs. that was a grand day for me when I came into this study, and you were cut, only for a second, and I renognised the brown portfolio, and carried it off I never would have gueesed its value had you not made such a fuss and such a looking up of it once, when I came upon you unexpectedly once before."

Where is is now? "At my lawyers. No, no, you have no hance. You can't steal it. It's in a atrong chance. box and only to be given up by my written anthority.

"You will give it up for ten thousand pounda?

'And set you free for ever?" with a sneer. "And set me free for ever," he repeated.
"And supposing I won't?"

"Then you must support yourself in future."

"And peach on you?"
"Yes, if you like. [It] will ruin] me, of course

Rain you! Hang you, you mean!"
"No I don't. There is no fear of my neck, thank you. I shall lose the money. I may get a year's imprisoument—that is the most harm can do me."

"A year's! You'll be affifer, as jeure as I sit here!"

"And you will starve! You could not earn an honest panny it your life depended on it. You can cheat at cards and over races. Toat's

"If I were you I would be ashamed to talk of honest pennies. I wonder the word does not choke you!"

"And if I were you I'd take ten thousand pounds and clear out of this country. ood offer, and you will never get a better, so think it over carefully." "Well, I'll think it over, and let you know to morrow."

You must fire the papers." "If I do you must make it twelve thousand.

"What a rascal you are, Charlie Horne!" "The same to you. You are the pot if I am the kettle. It's a temptation to collar the swag, and go back to her country. I've a longing to see the old blue gom treas, and the bright sky out there once more, and to hear the bleating and mooing in the stock yards." "How poetical and romantic, and to gamble in low dens, and to drink in bars, and to swagger over the old chums as long as you have a coin in your pocket.'

"Talking like that is a good way to make me give you what you want, is it not?'

"Oh! if you sink me I sink you. W Wagink or swim together; and I fancy you know on which side your bread is buttered; no one better."

" I'm not sanguine in that. Well, time is flying, and I must go. It's nearly one o'clock. nying, and I must go. 1s's nearly one o'clock.
I'll let you have an answer to morrow, and if it is yes you and I pay over within a month.
I'm thinking of taking a wife out with me.
What do you say to that?"

"Who-who would have you?" "Oh! a monstrous fine girl, and one that looks as well bred as any lady in the land—your wife's maid, Sara Parr. I suppose you have noticed her? I suppose you

"I don't like that girl."

"Then she and I will be in the same boat, so that's as it should be. She is handsome, young, agreeable, and olever."

"Ay! that's just it. She has a fine pair of eyes and a sharp tongue. She is clever, Take care you don't find her too clever for you some day. Is it settled that you are going to marry her?"

Quite."

"Have you asked her?"

"No; but that is a mere matter of form. The girl is madly in love with me!" he said, impressively.

Everyone to their taste. As far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to see the lest of her. She always seems so me as if she was looking for something, and always had her ears pricked." Ciever Mr. Paske!

"She was probably watching and listening for me," said Mr. Horne, with outrageous con-

"Oh, possibly!" said the other, with a grant.

"Well, I'm off. You had better let me ont through the window here, not to be knocking up your house and grand men servants. Lord if they only knew! Many a time I have seen you cleaning your father's horse and buggy, and chopping wood!"

By this time Mr. Paske had pushed back the curtains and opened the window, letting a cold blast into the room. Luckily for Sara he brought no candle, and she stood cowering up in a corner, scarcely venturing to draw her

Mr. Paske was in a hurry to speed the parting guest. Mr. Horne was in a hurry to be gone. He made-his exit quickly, the window was closed, the curtain drawn, and Bara still atood with her kness knocking together, her face damp with perspiration, but undisovered!

Mr. Paske drew up to the fire, lit a cheroot, poured out nearly half a tumbler of raw brandy, and sat over the coals buried in thought, running his squarely-shaped hands through his grizzly hair, and occasionally muttering aloud.

At last he fell asleep. The fire went out the clock on the mantelpiece struck three. Bara was tired and cold. She slipped off her shoes was treed and cold. Sole supper on her biding place.
She was safe; he was enoring. Gently she reached the door, softly she turned the handle, and stole up like a ghost to her own room.

Luckily no one shared it with her. then undressed rapidly in the dark, said her prayers, and got into bed and slept soundly.

Her boldness and audacity had been rewarded. She had done a good night's work, and found out something at last!

CHAPTER XXXI.

The day after her adventure in the shokingroom Sara locked herself securely into her own room, and sat down and wrote the following letter—a letter which took some thought, and a considerable amount of time:—

"DEAR CAPTAEN HYDE,-

"At last I have discovered some. thing! Waiting for events, or for chance slips of conversation, was weary and seeless, especially when I had to work hard all the time, and 'and keep my place.'

"Last night I was resolved on a bold stoke, and I have been repaid for my venture! Mr.
Horne dined here, and he and Miss Pontites. had high words at dinner, and a violent quarrel. She told him plainly that he was only fit to be in the servants' hall, shat he was drunk, and that she would never sit in the room with him again; and Mr. Paste sat by, to his relation's amazement, looking volumes, but saying nothing, instead of, as shey expected, kicking the insolent wretch out of the house; but afterwards, in the privaty of his smoking room, Mr. Paske said a great deal to Mr. Horne, and I was behind the window ourtain, and heard every word they uttered.

"I was not discovered. If I had been I doubt

"I was not disovered. If I had been a lift I would be writing you this letter.

"They drank brandy, or whisky, and smoked and quarrelled. Mr. Paske wants Herne to quit the country. He easy his hass. ing on here is suspicious; that people wender, that his own family detest him, that he had much better return to Australia and stay there "After much wrangling Horne agreed to go on payment of ten thousand pounds, to be raised by Mr. Paske by insuring his life.

"They talked 'of the girl who had come home from India," meaning me; and Mr.

last of d her stening

us con with a me out

ocking

Lord.

buggy,

back

ting a Bara vering wher

d the rry to still . ındis eraot. raw d in anife

nally

, the Bara

hoes

1800 her ly.

es, the

fex ent

be nd

ng. er,

Paske related how he had bad an interview with a bold young woman, a Mrs. Hyde, who had asked him to acknowledge the girl as his eldest daughter. This he had declined, and had dismissed her with a ten pound note, and nau de la constant de

"Horne is to receive twelve thousand pounds demn when he gives up a little portfolio con-taining certificates, letters, and papers, which he stole from his confederate, in order to have a secure hold over him.

"This exchange is to take place in about tendars. The papers are deposited at a bank in Daver.

is Dayer.
"Quee Mr. Paske gets them into his hands he will destroy them, of course. Why he did not do so before seems strange; but why do gully men so often keep the proofs of their cimes?

"It is my aim to get hold of this portfolio by hold or by orook; if not we are lost. Mr. Horse, so I heard him say, intends to marry me, and lake me out to Australia as his bride. He admitted that he had not asked me yes, but as he is quite certain of my consent he considers that to be an insignificant detail. On! if I could only lay my hands on those papers — the certificates of my parents' marriage and of my birth, we would no longer he two names.

le two paupers.

"I shall do my vary best to gain my end, and I may have to call upon you for assistant. There is bliss Pontifex a bell, and I makes.

"Yours faithfully, "Sara Pann."

Tothis letter she received a short note in

"DEAR SYLVIA, -

"I prefer this name to Sara. I have moived and burnt yours. All I can say is that you are a wonderful girl; and if we are to succeed, you will carry us through single-haded. At the same time, command me to any axiant. I shall not leave Dover—not get ferfrom bastacks, so that a wire from you will always find me.

"The latest news is, that a year having shad gines Robert Hyde's death, and Lhaving approofs of my wile's high, the fortune has layed to Bernard. I recayed a notice to that affect this morning from Sparp and Shat. "I prefer this name to Sara. I have

"I also hear that he is going to be married sumediately to Mrs. Dering. Only for her, and baseds, I would and Ungle Robert's lears and nations, a would not have lost the money; and now, in spite of his animosity and his mad will, she is sing to have the spending of his fortune site, all. At's enough to make him the from his grave!

"Yours,
"R. H."

This piece of news was quite true; and a two days later there was a smart wedding at 84. Pater's, Esson-square, when Bernard Hyde, Esq., led to the alter the beautiful Mrs. Dering, widow of the late Angustus Dering, of Moreside Park and Curson-street—vide the manning representations.

maning papers.

Demard had auddenly scrambled up the ladder, and touched the summit of his ambi-

How quickly he had got up these latter rungs of the ladder, and Roger and his pauper site were left at the bottom!

Bernerd had tied himself to an adventuress to nothing. It was a capital joke, and his wife entered into it with wonderful spirit.

They went to Paris and Vienna, and apant money, and, were overwhelmed with presents and latters of congratulations and greetings from oasnal acquaintances, whom they must be money, and who seemed to have suddenly developed into old and intimate friends.

Ohl what it is to have nine thousand ayear! It opens up a vista of town and country houses, shooting, hunting, dinners, balls, and even game and flowers to the sharp eyes of some people, who would cross the street to avoid you had you shabby booss and umbrella, and only two hundred a year. Nothing succeeds like success.

Sara's "day out" was a bright one—early in November. The sun was so warm, the sea so smooth, the sky so blue, that you could scarcely realise that you were not in the early days of September; and some of the ladies who promenaded on Dover parade seemed to be still dlinging to their summer Izooks.

Sara, according to request, had made har-self very smart. She looked "quite the lady," a regular tip-topper, thought Mr. Horne, when he first caught sight of her in her neat tailor-made jacket, boa and muff, small toque, and well-out French gloves. He paid her a good many compliments as they strolled up and down in the sun that lovely day.

lovely day.

"Let us sit down here," said Mr. Horne, pointing to a bench, "and take our ease, and quizz the passers by."

pointing to a bench, "and take our east, and quizz the passers by."

"Yes, but I'd much rather you would tell me another story," said the wily Sara. "Some more about Australia. I liked the last so much."

"Well, I must thick. I suppose you don't know much about India? But I'll tell you a story of Australia and India mixed. That may interest you. Or,"—as if struck with a sudden thought—"shall we go off and get our photographs done? Morning is the beat time. We would make a handsome group!"

"No, no, no. I am tired. Let us stay here, and please tell me your story. I like sitting here quietly, and watching the sea."

"Well, once upon a time there was a chap over in Australia a doctor's son—a sharp lad, but always looking beyond what he had in hand, always craving to better himself and be a big swell; and this craving lost him many a place, for with looking to the future he neglected the present, and seemed to be he neglected the present, and seemed to be always expecting a fortune to drop into his

"He was first a clerk, and he lost that billet; then on a run as accountant and stock-keeper, he lost that; then he went to Melbourne, and went in for gambling, and delbourne, and went in for gambling, and did well for a while, strange to say. He was a hard chap. He fought with his mother over the little the doctor left, and stripped her almost bare, and spent what he took. He seemed to think, though he was only the son of a struggling doctor, that he had a right to the best of everything, the same as a duke's heir, and did not care what he did, or who he trampled on to get it.

"Oh! he was hard, and selfish, and grasping, and ambitious, and yet he did not feel inclined to work for all this. He was nearly thirty years of age and still nothing par-ticular, still on the look out, when he thought he would go off to India, and take to tea in Assam. There was a former schoolfellow there doing pretty well, and he know some-thing of chemistry, and thought he might try a new way of trying to live, a new field for his enterprise,"

"Yes; and did he succeed?" inquired

"In a way he never expected. He was only up beyond Shillong about six months when the tea planter lost his wife came, and in for a great fortune, being next-of kin to some old lady he had never even heard of in England. However, the lawyers had ferreted him out, and there was the fortune all waiting him and all tied op—strange to say.

"He did not seem much set on it. His wile's death was a great blow, and he did not seem to get over it. He was going down country on business to some solicitors in Calcusta with this overseer of his, and he fell out of the train and was killed! They were in the same carriage, and the Australian, with great presence of mind, changed identities, and made out that the overseer was killed, and the tea planter survived.
"In India one has lots of luggage in the carriage, as they are very roomy; so he put on the fellow's clothes, opened his boxes, read up his papers, and had everything pat, and slipped into the fellow's shoes, and took his name and fortune, and passed entirely unquestioned and scot free."

"That certainly is a strange story! But how could be pass himself off? They mass have been quite different in appearance?"

"So they were-though both dark, and both of a height and age. The tea planter had led a lonely life in Assam for years, had few friends, and when they heard he had got a triends, and when they heard he had got a fortune, and gone home, they were not surprised. Why should they be? And Paske had one little girl. Hullo! I have let alip a name," becoming very red. "So much for my long tongue, and for you pressing me to tell stories. I doubt but mischief will come of this! Why the deuce could I not be prudent? Mind you, you are as though you had never heard? Do you hear me?"

"Ol course I do. I am deaf. You have told me nothing. You may be quite comfortable."

"Oh, may I? Well, you will make me still more comfortable if you will make me still more comfortable if you will make me still more comfortable if you will make me still all. I am going to cut this played-out old country; and I want to take a wife back to Melbourne. I am a rich man. I shall take twelve thousand pounds in hard cash with me. What do you say, Sara; will you be Mrs. What do you say, Sara; will you be Mrs.

He seemed to have no doubt of her reply, as he smiled at her encouragingly.

"I—I—am very much obliged," she stammered.

"Of course you are. It's a great rise for you from service. You will he a real lady, and keep your own maid. Still you are a very handsome girl, and look as if you might be a duchess. So that's all settled. I can only give you short notice, you see, and you had better give warning at The Hermitage, and we will get the license." get the license.

get the license."

"But stop, Mr. Horne, I have not said yes, and I must have time to make up my mind. You will have to give me a week to think over it at the very least," said Bara, nervously.

"Nonsense! What can you have to make up your own mind about?"

"About going to Australia, and spending the rest of my life there. I don't think I should like it. Now, it you were going to stay at home it would be another thing. I am very fond of England!"

"Yes, but I am not going to stay at home.

Yes, but I am not going to stay at home. I am bound to sail in three weeks' time for Melbourne. Let me write up, and take a double first-cless passage. Come now I don't be silly I don't say no!"

"But surely this notion of going to Australia and the sail of the sail of the say no!"

tralia is very sudden, and something quite

"No; it's been in my head this long time. I've not been home for nine years, and I have a gest of longing to sniff the smell of the blue gum trees, and eat a damper once more, and to ride a free-going water!"
"I descript I can make you a damper here.

"I daresay I can make you a damper here. Is it not only flour and water?"

"I envy anyone not born out there, to turn out the real thing; and talking of cating, let us go to the hotel naw and have a good lunch, and atterwards we will go up to the Castle on Shakespeare's Cliff, whichever you like!"

As they rose to go be said,—
"There's that chap—that Hyde!—walking past with another officer. He has been up and down, and up and down, keeping his eye on us. I wonder what he wants? I don's know him save by sight, and neither do you!"

To this remark Sara made no reply; but followed her companion to an adjacent hotel, where he ordered "a tip top luncheon," as he expressed it woysters, grouse, champagne—the best-they had in the house. Rauting his loose silver in his pocket, and issuing his wishes with his hat on the back of his head, luncheon and of a the three same of a same of jest and tear that the

No

T

[THE EDGE OF THE CLIFF GAVE WAY, AND, WITH A FEARFUL SHOUT, MR. HORNE FELL CVFR]]

was soon served, and proved to be excellent. As Sara only drank water, and refused many pressing offers of champagne, therefore Mr. Horne was obliged to drink a whole bottle to himself, and it was quite as much as was good for him.

He was exceedingly loud and talkative as he he was exceedingly foud and talianty as a strolled up towards Shakespeare's Cliff, pausing for breath every now and then, and to survey the opposite white coast of France. He was in the act of declaiming about his native land with both arms outstretched when the foreign land he stood upon—treacherous alien soil!—suddenly gave way beneath his feet. He had been walking perilously near the edge, and, with a fearful shout, he went over.

A small, justing out piece of chalk arrested his immediate descent about six feet down; and there, with his nails buried into the bank, the wretched man clurg between sky and sea, no one in sight but Sara and a little boy, and the ignorant crowds pacing the streets, pier, and parade below.

He glanced up at Sara with a white face, on which was written a passion of fear and despair, and she looked back at him rigid with despair, and see somed seeks at him rigid with borror, with starting eyes and panting breath; but fear had not paralysed her. She screamed to a coastguard far away. She stripped off she shirt of her dress in an instant, and flung part of it to the wretched man over the cliff, whilst she and the boy held the other. They lay flat down at the very brink, and clutched it with all their might, for the lump of chalk was gradually giving way, and nothing could save him from a horrible death but their united exertions. Alas! he was desta out their united exertions. Also he was heavy; he weighed fourteen stone. He was more than they could support. The coastguard, running up, was just in time to see the skirt slip from their hands; and the unfortunate man, with a tinkling of pebbles, and a dull roar of gravel, slide down the cliff. That fall at the bottom. Ugh! how it sounded! It was sickening.

The place at which Mr. Horne went over was not from the summit of the oiff, from which so many have lost their lives, but further on, where the cliff is lower. The dress curther on, where the cliff is lower. The dress and the gradual drop had broken his fall, and there a quarter of an hour later he was picked up. He was still alive, though quite unconscious. He was carried to the hotel from which he had recently issued in such excellent health and spirits. A surgeon was at once on the spot, a nurse sent for. Bara gave his name and address, and said that all expenses would be liberally paid by Mr. expenses would be liberally paid by Mr.
Paske of The Hermitage, Walmer.
Mr. Paske, she told herself, would be only

Mr. Paske, she sold herself, would be only too well pleased to get rid of him so cheaply, and would spare no expense for his doctor, nurse, and funeral. Yes, the surgeon had told ber that he believed the injured man had fractured his spine. It would not be a painful ending, but it was only a question of a few days; but friends had best be told. And she knew them. Yes, if she could do nothing else for him, she would go over to Walmer, and inform Mr. Paske without debay.

'Yes.' asid the surgeon. "You have no and inform Mr. Peake without debay.

"Yes," said the surgeon. "You have no time to lose. The sconer his friends come, and his worldly affairs are settled, the better. He will probably be conscious to-morrow. There will be an inquiry, of course, about the accident, and you will have to give evidence, but that won't be for a few days, probably not until the inquest is held."

"The inquest!" She shuddered.

Sara found Roger Hyde waiting outside the hotel, when she left it. She was very white and shaken, and seemed as one dazed. Never before in her life had she been brought face to face with tragedy of this sort, tragedy and "It has been a bad business," said Roger, as he joined her. "Is there any chance for him?"

"Not the smallest," she answered. "When I think of it all—the sudden alip, the giving way of the turf, his awful cry, his face, and our struggle to save him—I feel quite sick " and she leant against a wall.

"I have no doubt you do. Come into this "I have no doubt you de. Come into the confectioner's, and have some wine or coffee."
"No, I must go back at once. I have to tell the news to Mr. Paske."
"And good news it will be to him, I fancy! I shall go with you," hailing a passing fly.
"What, to The Hermitage?"
"No, to Walner. You don't look fit to "No, to Walmer. You don't look fit to travel by yourself, and you shan't travel all that way alone."

that way alone."

Bhe certainly did not look fit for much; although she had replaced the shirt of her dress, and was outwardly, neat and tidy as usual. Her voice shook, and her hand trembled, as if she had the palsy.

"Very well, you shall come to Walmer station. I shall want to husband all my strength and all my wits for what is coming."

"And what is that?"

"A life and death struggle between Mr.
Paske and me, for the contents of the portfolio. I mean to have them at any cost, and "How are you going to set about getting them? Cannot I do something?" said Roger, eagerly. "I am ashamed to be idle. Cannot I tackle Paske?"

"I think not; but, of course, I will let you know if you can. I shall return here to Dover, and stay with Mr. Horne till the last. He is sure to ask for ms. He proposed for me to day, and wanted me to go out with him to Melbourne in three weeks' time."

" Poor beggar, he will never see Malbourne again," said Roger, emphatically.

"No, they think his spine is injured, and he can't live more than a few days. If you saw where he went down you would wonder he was alive now."

(To be continued.)

["BOTSER THE DORGAS MEETING]" SAID RUPERT. "YOU MIGHT SPARE A FRI LOW FIVE MINUTES, '4 NOVELETTE.)

y i ort-

dle. you for rne and

THE OCEAN OF LIFE.

CHAPTER I.

"War are you doing here?"

The voice was harsh, the tone uncomprising, and the figure cowering in the darkest shadows of the inner porch abrank still further from the questioner. But he was not to be

"What are you doing here?" he questioned ight, and bending forward touched her with namborinative finger. "You had best answer to quickly and trushfully.

A white, flower like face, with dark, despendent his eyes was lifted to meet the clergyman's sen regard. It was the face of a girl not more han seventeen, but it already bore the impress of sorrow and want.

"I wanted to stay here to night," said a low, sweet voice. "I am afraid of the dread-ld sizess."

"But the clerk is making fast all the doors. In would have been looked in here until the mining had I not discovered you."
"I should not have been afraid," she an-

Wered, wearily. "This is God's house; Stray I am safe here!" The Reverend Kennedy listened frowningly.

Then he said,-

"Where is your home?"
"I have no home."

"But you have friends?"
"But you have friends?"
"Not one in the world. I buried my father jetterday," and here the sweet voice faltered and bocke, the dusky eyes grew heavy with warshe would not shed. "He was ill so long that all over the same would not shed." that all our savings went, and so this morning the landlady told me I must leave."

"What was your father before his ill-

"A clerk in the city," the girl answered.

And now she rose and faced her questioner, and he saw she was very slight—just a mere slip of a girl, all unfitted to battle with a cruel and wicked world. But he had been to often deceived by candidates for charity that his naturally suspicious nature had grown more and more distrustful with each passing year; and his voice was not a whit less harsh when he bade her tell him where she had last lived, and what guarantee she could give of her re-spectability. But the poor child was too muserable, too desolate, to resent his manner or his questions, and answered meekly enough. The clergyman stood silent and thoughtful a moment, then he said,-

"Of course, your story may be true, and if so you are to be pitied; but before I can give you any material assistance I must satisfy myself of your integrity. But our church commands us to extend charity to all; so, for to-night at least, I will take you to my own home; in the morning Mrs. Kennedy will know what to do with you. Come." The clerk advanced jingling his keys, and glanoing curiously at the slim, black-robed figure.

"I am going now, Sterne," said Mr. ennedy. "Have you made all fast?" Kennedy. "Yes sir."

" Very well. Oh, Sterne, I had forgotten I have a parochial meeting to attend to morrow, so I must ask you to go to number five Charles-street, Torrington road, and make inquiries there about this young person. What is your name?

"Kitty Romayne."

"She states she is an orphan of respectable birth, reduced to this strait by misfortune.

Ascertain if these statements are correct."
"Yes, sir," then he added quickly, as if fearful of giving offence, "my daughter Jane has gone to fresh service, sir, and this poor girl can have her bed, if you care to give her into

"No, Sterne, no," ungraciously. "I prefer she should remain for the present under my own special espionage. Good-night. Come, girl."

She followed slowly and apathetically, She followed slowly and apanesically, bardly conscious of her protector's ungracious manner, his frowning suspicious regard; hardly wondering what would be the next event in her sad young life. And presently they ce me to a large gloomy-looking bouse, to which they were admisted by a severely respectable man-servant, of whom Mr. Kennedy

"Where is your mistress?"

"In the library, sir."

Bidding Kitty follow him, he led the way to a large and gloomy looking room where a lady.

eat writing.

"Eunice," he said, with no softening of his barsh voice, "I have brought you a protegée."

mare voice, "I have brought you a protegée."

Mrs. Kennedy locked up quickly, and the sweet, somewhat rad face grew very pitiful ac she met the appealing glance of those dark brown eyes. But she did not venture to speak, until her husband added,—
"She is without friends, without bome, but claims to be respectable. Give her a bed tonight. In the morning I shall know what to do with her."

do with her."

do with her."

"Poor obild!" said Mrs. Kennedy, in a gentle voice, "so young, and so friendless.

Tell me your name, my dear?"

"Eunice, how often am I to remonstrate with you on your ill advised sentimentality? Give the girl into Marsha's care. There is nothing you can do to night."

nothing you can do to night."

"Martha is not very well, Dunstan. I will attend to her myself; and afraid lest her husband should forbid even this act of kindness, she hurried Kitty away to a listle spare chamber at the top of the house. There her first act was to force the poor waif into an easy chair, unfasten the thin jacket she wore, and remove the cheap crape hat which hid the masses of dusky hair.

"My dear," she said, "have you eaten anything to-day?"

Kitty shook her head; she could not speak,

Nov

position

onvary equal.

roka be a kinda

contact althoug

tamons sort w with the groups and all the by her that, Feeler mith a sery silvence, a lair face

hape at wind with a to the second to the sec

PARES

Mr. K.

death, Her li where dread!

alone 'I'

KDOW

I not

Ruper

little] Ikm

unifor y wo

His called Raper bome

Mrs. I

He

bare bright

loebid Btil

than over them them the winds with t

He I in 6 80

for this unusual kindness choked her utter. ance; and she was faint, too, with long fasting and woe.

With a compassionate look Mrs. Kennedy hurried out, to return in a short while with some ham sandwiches and a cup of fragrant coffee (the strongest heverage allowed in that

"Eat and drink first," she said, "then, if you like, you may tell me about yourself." And whilst Kisty discussed the welcome food she pretended to busy ferself with some memoranda she drew from her pocket. Refreshed and strengthened, the girl put saide her plate, and waited for her benefactrons to speak.

"How old are you, Kitty?" was the first questian.
"Just seventeen, madam; father died on

"Just seventeen, medam; Iather died on my hishday."
"Pour child! Was he ill long? Will it do you gend to tell me all your sorrowful atory? If so, do not heritate to confide in me. I am ald enough to be your mother; and I do not ask on of sulgar curiosity."
"Oh. I know! I know! You are most good to me, and I would like you to feel I am really what I say I am. There isn's much to tell. It is a common lot. this a common story. Mine is a common lot, but that does not make it easier for me to beer. My mother and father marked when they mess very young—mether me a governous and father a clerk in the city, taking a ness, and father a clerk in the city, saking a good selecy. They never had any other child has me, and so I was not obliged to learn any trade. I wish now I had; but they squarted me well, and guarded me so carefully that I never know a mant or a broable till mother died four years ago. I think her death hoke my father's heart. He was never the same again; and broading over his trouble undermined his strongth; so that when, nine months ago, he took a severe chill, the doctors all ago, he took a severe chill, the doctors all said it would be fatal. Oh, madam! I watched him fading day by day, and tried to believe I was mistaken, but could not. He grew weaker and weaker—less and less able to help himself. Then his place in the office was filled up, and we lived wholly upon his savings. How guickly they went, although they had taken so long to heard! And I saw nothing but staryation before us, when we had come to the end of them, for in all the world we had not a single measure or friend.

"Thank Heavan! he never lived to know what. Just a west age, to day he died. Oh! my heart, he died, and I was all alone. There was just enough money left to bury him and was just enough money left to bury him and pay the rent; and whan I hadastiled those claims the landlady came to me and said, knowing I was anable to keep the rooms she had let blem, and would be glad if I would vacite them at once. Heartbrokenly, I came away, and after wandering about all day I stole into St. Sapulcher's Church, thinking I would steep there to aight, and in the morning I would try for work. Mrs. Cresser, the landlady, allowed me to leave my box behind, as I could not carry it with me. She said she really ought to claim my things, because of the trouble the funeral had head."

"She is a rapsedius woman," Mrs. Kannedy said sharply, "hat she is not entirely mistress of the situation. To morrow, Kithy, we will see what can be done for you. Now go to bed and try to rest. Good.night, Heaven blass yon.

and try to rest. Good night, Heaven bless yon, child. And allowing Kitsy no time for senly she hurried away, less Mr. Kennedy should comment on her long absence. And Kitsy, worn out by her serrow, and the weary wanderings of the day, soon fall fast askep.

Dunetan Kennedy, Vicar of St. Sepulchro's, was not a normal, man.

Dunstin Kennedy, Vicar of St. Sepulchre's, was not a popular man. He worked indefatigably in the parish, giving his time and energy, without saint; he organised a reading club and a night-class, gave large sums to the poor, and yet he was not popular. Those who most esteemed him neither liked nor understood him, and wondered how so pretty and hindly a woman as Mrs. Kennedy could have married such an austere man.

austere man. He was strictly evangelical in principle, and the services at St. Sepulchre's were very dreary indeed, the Vicar refusing to permit more singing than was absolutely necessary. The pasime were read in the form of a duet between parson and people. The hymns were dreary compositions, drearily droned; and the sermons were very long, and generally of a terrifying nature.

There was small wonder that the congregation dwindled down to a more handful of wor-shippers, who attended principally through long habit or attachment to the obarch itself. and Dunstan Kennedy never strove to con-ciliate a single member of his flock; ungracious, and ungainly in manner and appearance, making duty his god, he held austerely on his

In his own house he reigned supreme. It was he who regulated the arrangement of the rooms, who sternly forbade the introduction of the dainty ornaments and draparies in which his wife's heart delighted; he called them "vanities," and inveighed against them feresty; and ade as to meek to resist. He did many a good deed, but he was hardly over thanked—his manner of doing a kindness precluded that. And it mas to this man's home Kithy had some—warm hearted, little Kithy Romayne, who, natil her tather's death, had never known a harsh word or look. She was roused early in the mosting by a neat, middle aged maid, who said.—"Kan'd better dress quickly as the prayer-bell will ring soon and the master never excuses as from prayers; if you make haste I il wait for you."

Kithy needed no second bidding. Dressing with for you."

Kitty needed accessed bidding. Decesing with heavy fagers, she seen declared hereal ready, and Martha led the way to the breakfast room where the others were already assembled.

Mar Kennedy looked up with a timid smile of welcome, but her husband did not lift his eyes from the heavy Bible except when he asked,
"Where is Mr. Rupert?" and a servant volunteered the information, "He has not left his room vet. sir."

Without waiting Mr. Kennedy began the meraing's devetions, and just in the middle of the second chapter the door opened quietly, and a handsome young fellaw slipped into his place beside Mrs. Kennedy. She gave him a reproschial look, which he answered with a smile, and then can back and listened, with closed eyes, to the harsh voices reading divine words of love and confert. Then followed the prayers; and they being ended, Kitty prepared to leave the room with the servants, but the olergyman's voice recalled her.

Kithy Romagne until I have proved you what you claim to be, I request you to take your meals in the room set apart for you. You nay go to it now."

The pale young face flushed, the lips quivered, and the dark eyes glanced a fittle indignantly at him an she said, "Sir, you have been very good to me, but if you accuse me of being other shan I seam, let me go awy now."

"I neither seems mer condem," coldly,
"and if you left here, where would you go."

"I do not know," wearily, "but there is always the river."

"I will talk to you later on," sternly. "Your life is not your own. Go back to your reom." And as she escaped through the open deer she as conscious of the kindly regard of the young fallow she had heard called Mr. Rupert.
Upstairs she went, and flinging herself on ses beside her bed, sobbed wildly-"Oh father I father been back to your little daughter; I cannot bear suspicion I—I cannot bear life here," and she wept without restraint. She did not see Mrs. Kappedy again that marning. The lady had been strictly forbidden any intercourse with the poor little waif until she had been proved free from soil or amirch; for Danstan Kennedy quite believed in making the gulf between the sheep and the goats as wide as possible. So the lady sat in the breakfest-room sawing rough flannels that her soul abhorred, and listening to the pleasant young of her husband's handsome young

"Who is uncle's new prottyde? She is very pretty, and looks quite a lady."
"Poor child! she is an orphan, and her story is a sad one. I hope Dunstan will do the best he can for her.

"He need not speak to her as though she were less good than she looks.

"My dear, he has had much to render him
"My dear, he has had much to render him
"with history suspicious. You never credit him with his true worth and goodness. You do not understand

Ropert said nothing. He was too genuinely fond of his aunt to disbeas her by harsh oriticisms on Mr. Kennedy; but he thought Kitty Romayne was not likely to receive much kindness or consideration from the autere olergaman. In the afternoon Kitty was once more summened to her benefactor's presence. No kindly amile lit up the heavy frowning taces also entered, and there was no softer note in the stern woice as he said.

the atern voice as he said.

"I find your atory is quite correct, and am pleased to know I have not been imposed upon. If you are willing to remain here, and lead a godly and industrious life, I have given Mrs. Kennedy permission to reseive year into her sarvice. Lately her sight has been falling; and as I undesstand you are capable of doing and as I undesstand you are capable of doing and as I understand you are capable of doing the sawing and conducting her correspondence for her, there is no reason why you should not prove a suitable person, if you are so inclined. Mrs. Kennedy herself will deal with you in the matter of wages. You may go now."

She accepted gladly from his most ungracious presence, and went up to her own room. Thankful as she was for this recome from starvation and death, she yes thought with horror of a life spent in this gloomy house, with no one to love her, or speak comfortingly to her—she whose whole life until now had been sheltered from hardship or harshows. been sheltered from hardship or harshness.

CHAPTER II.

"Miss Kitty, don't you ever cease working?"

"I am very busy this morning. Mrs.
Kennedy wants these garments finished to day. You know the Doroas meeting is to-"Bother the Doress meeting! You might spare a fellow five minutes.

A hot flush mounted the girl's pale face, and she glanced nervously at the door, then said, in a very low voice,—

"Mr. Ropers, I wish you would go away."
"Why?" she young man asked, salmly, contemplating the sewer.

"Mr. Kennedy would be angey to find you

" I don't see why he should. He can't expect me to pore all day over my books; or it he does he will be grievously disappointed. Though I hope to take a good degree I am met altogether a bookworm; and you know Miss Kuty, there is a time to work and a time

"You are wilfully minunderstanding me,"
"You are wilfully minunderstanding me," she said, indignantly. "You know as well as I that our relative positions do not warrant
I that our relative positions do not warrant any intercourse between us. You are the son of a gentleman, I the orphan of a poor derk, and your aunt's attendant."

"You should not talk so, Kisty. You are as much a lady as Aunt Euniss, and a great favourite with her. It is only stupid pride that makes you hold me at arm's length, and it ien't worthy you."

The pale versus for a declar to the contest of the c

The pale young face flushed more hely than

"I am not proud, neither am I forgetial of my position in this house, or the ordel remarks your condust will subject use to. You forget what is due to me !"

The fair, handsome face grew white and atern. "I will give you no cause to say that again," he remarked, and went out of the com, leaving Kitty a prey to contending emotions.

She had been at the Vicarage a formight is very ad her do the ne were is true rstand harsh harsh hought much distore more a. No face as apposed re, and given a into alling; doing adence idence lined. ou in un-

OWD

from with tingly

work-

Mrs. is to-might then ay." lmly,

d you if he

I am time

rell as as son olezk, are as than dal of oruel . You bua: 01 ihat now, and was almost reconciled to her new position, for Mrs. Kennedy treated her with enverying hindness, and talked with her as an

With the Vicar is was different. For all his sigid Christianity he laid down hard and fast call showen classend class, and externed it a hindsone to let none with whom he came in contact forget his or her position.

He wade Kitty feel her dependent position is wore of ways, one of which was that he away addressed her by her Christian name, sibrogh, indeed, she cocupied the post of transcensie to his wife. But for that lady's manustrances he would have made her concept with the servants, and take her meals with them; but in this one thing his wife minred to oppose him firmly.

minred to oppose him firmly.

"I want my secretary to remain a lady," the mid. "I cannot afford to have her nice proptions blunted, or her manners coarsened

To kitty's meals were taken alone, and althouchours not filled by labour were spent by her in dreary solitude. It often happened that when she sat with Mrs. Kennedy, Rupert that, when she sat with Mrs. Kennedy, Rupert sould sunter in and apend a whole morning with them; and although Kitty was always my silent, she liked listening to the gay, young viet, and now and again to look at the bright is lace of the Vicar's naphew.

He was always kind to her, and now perhysshe had offended him beyond forgiveness, ad with that thought her head drooped low.

It was all very well to tell herself she had attel with propriety, that she could not have dussherwise. Such reflections failed to committee your desclate. It title heart, yearning so cassification and controlled to com-tail the poor desolate, little heart, yearning so passastely for love.

"I have made him angry," she thought sea and again, "and his anger is very hard shar; but what else could I do? He and I is nothing in common. He is a gentleman, I sail, without friends and without home. It samedy will be careful not to let me for-sitat."

He had rescued her from starvation and cash, but she could not feel grateful to him. But life was so dreary, so heavy, she often while he had left her in the church porch, there the must have frozen to death on that deadful night when she found herself all crafful night when she found herself all states in the world, hopeless and penniless.

"I should soon have been at rest," she said, with a thitle low sob. "I should have never known souther care or sorrow. Oh, why did I not file then? Before I learned to—to love Rapert to the increase of my woes?"

Tes, it had even come to that with poor little Kithy Romayne; and, perhaps, there was said wonder that it should be so. This handway, hight-faced young fellow, with his riming ways and tender amile, had been so dilloudy kind and gentle with her; had never, by word or look, reminded her of the gulf that haved between them.

hyand or look, reminded her of the gulf that have between them. His father, Admiral Kennedy had been all to the sick hed of a friend; so that have been coming from Oxford, fund the old must deserted save by the servants, and had then up his quarters with the Reverend and Mr. Kennedy. He was touched by Kitty's story, her pale, the server of the server mbideur by his note.

Sill he shought of her a great deal more has was wise or well; and as he sat poring our his books her face would rise between him and him, and he would almost fancy he hardshe low notes of her sweet young voice. It was more hour than he cared to soknow-like her according to the control of the same of the control of the cared to soknow-like her according to the cared to soknow-like her according to the cared to soknow-like her according to the cared to soknow-like the ca he was more hort than ne care a blogs by her words.

"You forget what is due to me." They stemed to imply that he had not always be lared to wards her as a gentleman, and the hot blod dooded his face as he said,—
"By-Heaven, she is the first to hint that I smack!" and he left the house in no very pleasant frame of mind. But he was of too genial and happy a disposition long to re-member any offence; and the next attension he strolled into Mrs. Kennedy's favourite room, where she and Kitty sat sewing. "You are jost in time, Rapert!" said the former. "We were getting quite drowsy over this interminable stitching; but it is wanted for some poor person in whom your uncle has an interest. Suppose you sit down and read to ne—always provided yeu have nothing better to do?"

"I shall be only too happy to stay, aunt!
What shall I read?"

What shall I reed?"

"Oh let Kitty objected.
And after turning over a quantity of books in a half-discontanted, dismayed-fashion, Rupert said boyishly.—

"Oh, look here! I san't read any of this awful twaddle. I'll run and get something you will like. I suppose you don't read Swinbarne, sun't?"

"I! Oh no. Your nucle does not awayee.

Swinbarne, aun'?"

"I! On no. Your unde does not approve profane poekry."

Muttering something the reverse of complimentary to Mr. Kennedy Rupert harried away, to raturn' presently with an austhetically bound volume, which he epened at once, and began to aread that marvellous poem, "The Triumph of Time." He read well, and his voice was musical and mellow, and right away from the opening wave. right away from the opening verse,-

"Before our lives divide for ever, While time is with us and hands are free, (Time swift to fasten and swift to sever Hand from hand as we stand by the sea). I will say no word that a man might say, Whose whole life's love goes down in a day,"

Whose whole life's love goes down in a day," to the closing lines, neither listener spoke, they hardly, indeed, seemed to breathe; and Kitty, all unconsoiously allowing her work to full upon her lap, sat with her large darkeyes fixed upon his face, drinking in every word of that most exquisite poem. She had never theard enything like this; and when it was ended, she gave a deep sigh, whether of pleasane or pain she could searcely tell.

Rupert was well-pleased with the effect it had produced upon her and not at all serry that before his ann's praise of it had ended she was summoned to interview a poor woman in the adjoining room. He was not the sort of fellow "ao let the grass grow under his feet," so he drew a little nearer, and bending solicitously over the girl, said,—
"I want you to prove you are not angry with me."

"Angry, Mr. Rapert? I hardly understand

"Well, you know you gave me that im-pression yesterday. You said I forgot what was due to you, and more in the same strain, and I have been thinking over it ever since. Miss Kuty, I should like to know you don't believe so poorly of me as that; for upon my honour I see no difference between you and any other lady (only that you are prettier), and I want very much to be your friend in every

I want very much to be your friend in every way."

"You are very good," she faltered, "but surely you must see friendship between us is impossible?"

"That is just what I can't see. Why should it be? Kitty, don't you trust me?"

"Yes," faintly, because the glamour of his strong, bright presence was upon her. "I know that you are an honest gentleman, but that does not alter my position towards you. I am a poor girl, and your ann't servant."

"Why do you talk like that? You are her equal in refloament, her superior in beauty and mind."

"Do you forget," wildly, "how your uncle found me?"

"No; and I wish I had been in his place.

But, there, I will say no more that may offend you, you incorrigibly obstinate young lady.
Only tell me I am forgiven."
"If there ever was anything to forgive, I forgave you before you asked it."
"And you will prove this by letting me how I shall miss you. I wonder if you eare give you some small pleasure. Now, don't worth any face or feaths. I have some books I am sure you would like to read. May I bring some down for you? I will leave them here in the recess, and you can take them to your room when you have an opportunity."

"You are most good, and I shall be glad to

"You are most good, and I shall be glad to avail royself of your offer."

That evening, he fore she went upstairs, she had occasion to go into the breakfast room, and there she found three volumes waiting for her. Kingsley's "Hypatia," Helen Mather's "Cherry Ripe," and Rosetti's "Poems."

"Poems."
With a thankful heart she carried them to her room. How good he was to her! She, who had nothing to give him in exchange for all his kindness—nothing but all the love of her innocent young heart. Inside "Hypatia" she found a little note addressed to herself.

" DEAR MISS KITTY,-

"To please me read this first, and do not hurry to return the volumes, although I have more for you when these are finished. I hope you will "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them" to your own pleasure, as they are all favourites with me. "R. K."

She kissed the words he had written, and looked the note away with her few small treasures—a look of her mether's hair, a posyring her father had give her long ago, and a few letters he had written her when he had been compelled by business to leave home for a short time.

The days slipped by with lightning speed to Ropert, bringing nearer and nearer the time of his return to Oxford; and, for the first time since he entered college, he looked forward to it with dread.

How to go and leave Kitty—his Kitty—to the mercy of Dunstan Kennedy, to her un-congenial, weary life, was the question agi-

His father. Admiral Kennedy, was as opposite as light is to darkness to his mode; but Ropert well knew the blaff old sailer would never concent to an engagement between his only son and a poor little waif of no standing or birth.

What should he do? His father was dear to him, but not so dear as Kitty, and he could not give her up, "There is nothing for it but patience," he thought, "I must keep my own counses for awhile, until I see the way clear to confess all to the governor. I wish I had chosen any profession but the medical. It will be such a precious time before I can earn enough to keep myself, let alone a wife!"

Yes knowing this, he did not intend returning to Oxford without speaking to Kitty; and ing to Oxford without speaking to Kitty; and the day before his departure he found his opportunity.

Mr. Kannedy was attending a vestry meeting, his wife was driving with a friend, and Kitty ast alone in the breakfast room engaged

Kitty sat alone in the breaklast room engaged in writing letters.

She looked shyly up as he entered, and blushed elightly.

"Are you very busy, Miss Kitty?" hearked, sauntering to the fireside, from which post he got a very good view of her poetry pale face.

"Is there anything I can do fer you, Mr. Rupert? I can spare ten minutes."

"I want to talk to you," he answered, a little awkwardly. "Do you know when I am reterning to Oxford?"

"Mrs. Kernedy said on Saturday, I be-

"Mrs. Kennedy said on Saturday, I be-lieve," Kitty murmured, looking intently down at her deak. "You will be glad to go; this place is dull for you!"
"I have not found it so," gravely; "and I am sorry that only three days of my vacation remain to me. You have made it very pleasant to me."
"I! Ob. Mr. Rusert."

at all about my going; or if you are too in-different to me to feel either glad or sorry." As he watched her, the slow tide of colour crept over throat and cheek, to die as slowly away, leaving her paler than before,

" Are you sorry, Kitty?" he persisted, and trembling a little, despite her utmost efforts to theep quiet, she said, in a very low voice,—

"I am sorry; you have been always so kind to me. I—I shall miss you!"
"Thank you, I am glad to hear you say that; and you may believe that I shall see that; and you may believe that I shall see you again as soon as I may; but my next vac. I must spend with my father. I take my degree next June, and then shall come up here to walk one of the hospitals, so we shall often meet then. You will not forget me?"

"No;" and she thought that she would never forget while life lasted.

Will you write to me?" he asked, coming a little nearer to her.
"Oh! no, no! I must not, I dare not!" she cried, tremplously.

"But why? You don't know how I should prize ever so little a line from you. I shall be very lonely at Oxford, and beset, too, by doubts that you have forgotten or will forget me. Now, if you would write me now and then you could not do that. I should sometimes dwell in your memory. Kitty, won't you give me in your memory. K

She bad risen and stood now twisting her fingers together in greatest agitation. Her eyes were downcast, her lips tremulous; and he seeing his advantage went nearer yet, and with gentle forced possessed himself of her white hands.

"Do not send me away comfortless." "It is wrong. I am very much afraid it is wrong; but I will write sometimes, not "How shall I thank you? You have made me very happy," and then he paused, looking ardently down upon her.

She was so sweet, so sad, so terribly alone in the world that his heart ached for her. She was so dear to him, and he so young and impastuous, that all in a moment he had her fast and close in his arms, and was kissing life and colour into her pale face.

"Kitty, I love you! I love you!" he cried, ad she, lifting star-like eyes to his and she.

"And I you; but oh! what will be the end

He held her fast.

You shall be my dear and honoured

"Oh! that will never, never be! Remember your father. What would be may if he knew the truth?"

CHAPTER III.

"Hz pleased himself when he chose his wife, he would bardly refuse his son a like privilege! 'But then his honest nature re-asserted itself, and he said, very gravely and

My darling Kitty, I am afraid he will not be pleased at first; but he is so generous and rm-hearted that we shall ha difficulty in winning him over to our way of thinking. So keep a brave spirit, dearest, and trust me in and through all. You do trust o?'' earnestly.

"Indeed—indeed I do; only—only, Rupert, there is such a terrible difference between us, and I am afraid nothing will ever be right with me any more. Oh, my dear! for all your love, for all the honour you have paid me, I thank you with a full and grateful hears; but never, never will I drag you down to my poor level; give you the cop of poverty to drink, the bitter bread of dependence to eat. If it is for your good you should marry me (and, oh! I dare not think that), I hope that day, when your love has stood the test of absence and opposition, we may come together. But if it is for evil, then night and day, on my knees, I will pray Heaven this union may never be. You are more than life itself to me. I will never hurt you," and then she burst into heavy sobs, which he vainly tried to check. "Let me be - just a moment," she to check. "Let me be - just a moment, to check. "I shall be stronger soon," and he chivalrously respected her entreaty.

In a little while she had grown calm enough

In a little to listen to him.

"Kitty, dear, you must not begin your gagement with doubts of my loyalty or fears organization of the future. We are both so young we can afford to wait a year or two if necessary, and I am not a fellow lightly to change; and should my father remain obdurate, that will not alter my fixed resolve; for should not a man leave father and mother and cleave to his wife? Only, of course, we should have to wait longer before we could marry. And now one thing more. In June I take my degree; until then I should wish to keep our engagement secret, because I am sure any rupture between my father and myself must materially lessen my chances of passing well. Am I asking too much of you, sweethears?"

"How can you ask too much—you who are giving me all? Let everything be as you wish, dear Rupert, and it will be well."
Her carness love, her simple faith in him touched him beyond all words. He bent his bright young face upon the glory of her dark tresses, and in his heart he prayed "Heaven make me worthy of her!"

His great love made him humble as a little His reverence for her would keep him pure and unsullied amongst all the temptations with which an university town is rife; and nothing would ever shake his great faith

"As soon as term ends I shall run up to town on some purely personal business, and then, of course, I shall see you. Then I shall go down to Penarvon (our place) and make a clean breast of it all to the governor. Until then I am resolved to look on the bright eide of affairs and do you, my Kitty, try to do the

"I-I shall not see you for five months!"

she whispered, brokenly.
"I am afraid not; but we shall both be so busy that the time will soon pass, and we shall have each other's letters for consolation.

Haven's you a photo of yourself, Kitty?"

No.

"Well, you must get one as quickly as possible, and send on to me. Mine (if you care to have it)—this slyly" you shall have before— But as you value our future happiness you will not let either Mr. or Mrs. Kennedy guess the truth. She would be our friend if she ared, but my uncle rules her with a rod of

"I will be very careful; and now, Rupert, I think you had best leave me. He will be returning soon, and he is so aurpicious."

But I must see you alone again before I go. Promise me I shall?"

"Do you shink I should deny myself that pleasure unless compelled?" she asked, with the first gleam of mischief he had ever seen in

"You little darling! So it is a pleasure to have me with you? Say it again and again."

"No Rupert, I must not foster your natural conceit." Then with a sudden change of manner. "Go now, dear love; I want to be alone. I want to think over this great and alone. I want to think over this great and blessed change in my life, to realise how good Heaven is to me. Oh Ropers! Rupers! my gladness is too great to last

.What answer he would have made to that was never known, for the hall door opened with a clang, and, much against his will, Rupert was forced to take a hasty farewell of his little sweetheart. On the staircase he met Mr. Kennedy.

"Are you going out?" he asked.
"Not if you have any work for me, uncle.

You look tired !"

The true servant does not think of fations "In the state servant does not think or rangue whilst his master has need of him," coldly; "but I should be glad if you would help me with these parochial accounts. I am not so clever at figures as I could wish."

So together uncle and nephew entered the study, and until the dinner bell rang busied themselves with the great pile of papers the clergyman had brought home with him. The young lovers had no further chance of in all the three days that follows Rupert's declaration, and Kitty was beginning to think that no word of farewell would pass between them.

It was Saturday morning, and Rupert's belongings were already in the hall. The carriage containing his aunt and uncle waited ostrings containing the best of the best of the blum, when he burst into her presence.

"I haven't a moment to spare Kitty, darling, but I couldn't go without a good bye. Here is my portrait, and mind you send me yours quickly. I will write you to morrow. As you open the letter bag there will be no dangar of discovery. Little sweetheart, little wife, good bye, good bye!"

"Good-bye, and Heaven bless you and keep you always," and then followed one quich you always," and then followed one quick passionate embrace, and—he was gone. Kitty passionase emirace, and—he was gone. Anny sank down upon a couch, and hiding her face in her hands gave herself up to bitter tears. What should she do now shat he was gone?

All the light and happiness seemed flown, and her heart ached with its intolerable se desolation. How should she bear to live through five long months without the sound of his voice or the touch of his hand? assurance of his deep and earnest love? Then anddenly she rose.

"I am a coward and ungrateful," she said. aloud, "but I will be so no more. I have much to learn before I am a fitting belomate for him. Heaven grant me strength and to make myself worthy him."

The days that followed were very heavy ones to Kitty; but she had much to do, and could not brood over her troubles as a less countied girl might have done. Then she had Rupert's letters to comfort het; and but for the fear of the Admiral's anger when he learned all she would have been happy, or as happy as she could be separated fro

She grew daily in favour with Mrs. Ken-nedy, but she never had been, and never would a favourite with her austere patron.

Perhaps she was too pretty and refined; perhaps there was something in the expression of her clear, soft eyes which seemed to re-proach him whenever he gave utterance to some especially hard judgment, or expounded some cruel doctrine to his own satisfaction. However, that may be, Dunstan Kennedy did not like Kitty, and half regretted taking her into his house.

The weeks and months went by, and Kitty counted the days which must elspse before Rupers came to her again. In March he travelled with the Admiral to Penarvon, where his vacation was spent; and from which place he wrote long and loving letters to his little sweetheart,

In April he returned once more to Oxford, and applied himself heart and soul to his studies. At last came degree day, and the Admiral had gone to Oxford to be present at his son's triumpb.

He was very proud of this fair-faced, honest young fellow; and when he found how good a degree he had obtained he was almost ready to promise him any gift he should ask.

Rupert felt inclined then to tell him all about Kitty; but a troop of friends swooped down upon him with congratulations, and insisted upon carrying him and the Adn to a dainty luncheon, provided by one of the number. After this there were calls to make and visitors to receive, so that the day were by wishous offering an opportunity to At night the his own and Kissy's cause. Admiral said,

"Ob, Repert, I expect you can be rea start with me to morrow for Peckerton's promised Maston we would spend next we with him. He has a nice place, and an extremely presty daughter," and he looked so cunningly at Ropers that he guessed his father Mastor This ance; faiher : after fi I will a " Ca Well, My boj I am p So $ Pankari

No

s neigh breakfa he went Kitty is step waiting # Kit s low or

"And one?" I passed. "Glad prayed f you are norrow and the low soo l am a now, wh should it will. Y never b out you and grie would b Litty, or OM TO

" Mus

For me jut she, iating, some wa myself, and I sh "Ois," tears, " served y could re not fit to

Sapers ! Man Hap! There, diappy he may to s "I shi he angry

He lat but I she

ed the busied es the noe of llowed

nning pass

pert's

aited itty, bye. i me

keep juick Kitty

face

rs. one?

in of live

The

Sie

AVO

will avy and less had r as ened;

re-to ded ion.

did

tty ore be

æd. the 85 dv

iral she ake

ore

1 to an so his father would not object to receive Miss Maston into his family.

This was complicating affairs with a venge-

This was complicating affairs with a vengeanc; but he answered, quietly,—
"I shall be ready to follow you in two days, father; but I have a little business to see after first in town. Bo, with your permission,
I will run up to my uncle's to morrow."
"(Inn's your business wait, Ru? No?
Well, then, I'll be off to Peckerton by an early train, and you can follow at your leisure.
My boy, you will be quite the lion of the place.
I am proud of you, Ru; more proud than I can tell. You have acquisted yourself so benourably."
So the next day the Admiral went to

So the next day the Admiral went to Peckerton, and Ropert hurried to town. To his great delight, he heard on his arrival at the Yoarage that his aunt was lunching with is neighbouring vicaress, and his uncle was she cut. But Miss Romayne was in the healfast-room; and so to the breakfast-room

Kitty had heard and recognised his voice, is step; and now she stood, all flushed and embling, one hand resting on the table, valuing for his entrance.

Taste was such love, such rapture in her que as they met his, that he held out his ums to her, saying,— "Kitty, my little darling Kitty!" and with absecty she ran forward to be caught in his sizes and tender embrace.

"And so you are glad to see me, little cas!" he asked, after the first greetings had pand.

"Glad! Oh, Rupert, I have longed and payed for this hour with all my heart. And not tell me of your success, for, of course, put are successful?"

"The successful?"

What faith you have in me, sweetheart; what faith you have in me, sweetheart; with state in this instance I deserve it. I have that an excellent degree. These last six maths I've worked like a Turk—all for you, as dailing—and I have my reward. Toay darling—and I have my reward. To-mow I am to join my father at Peckerton, at then I shall tell him all, and ask him how soon he will be ready to receive his little

"Must you leave me so soon? Oh, Rupert, I am afraid! But dear—never so dear as so, when this strange fear is upon me—thould be be angry you must submit to his still. You must submit to his angree who can sould be be angry you must submit so his will. You must try to forget me, who can nave be worshy you. Loving you as I do will all my hears, with all my strength, I jet could better bear to live all my life withten you would be the bear to know I had brought want ad grief upon you."

"Tou shall not look on the dark side. My had been anything; it wher has never yet denied me snything; it wold be curious if he did so now. And wald be curious if he did so now. And List, even should he be very angry I cannot be syou advise. I will never give you up. I'm no There shines one woman and none hi she, and you are that woman. Kitty taking, should the worst come, I will find the way in which to earn bread for you and small. You have no extravagant tastes. spail. You have no extravagant and but

"Oh," she said, with a burst of grateful lan, "you give up all for me; and if I stred you all the days of a long life I never talk repay your love and goodness. I am mids to be your wife; and yet—and yet, no other woman could love you as I do. Ropert!

Repart : Heaven grant me grace to make Heaven grant me grace to make manapy."

"I know you will do that, little woman.
"I know you will do that, little woman. hers, dry your tears, and let us spend one lappy half hour together. I suppose I must lappy half hour together.

"I think you had best do so, or he might is angry when he found you had been here. Is does not get more amiable wish passing time, although perhaps I should not say so." He laughed as he draw her close. "He is a cantankerous old ourmudgeon; but I shall always owe him a heavy debt of satitude because he discovered my wife for me. I wonder how he will receive the news of our engagement?"

"Not very graciously. He does not regard me very kindly, but Mrs. Kennedy is an angel. My own mother could not be gentler to me than she is."

Then they sat talking, as lovers have talked through all ages, and took very little notice of the passing time until a sonorous school-bell near chimed four, and Rupert sprang up in amazement.

in amazement.

"I must go Kitty, or I shall miss my train; but I shall be back again in two days with my good news. And then—then, sweetheart what happy years will lie spread before, us! Kiss me, sweet, and wish me good bye! Make what excuse you can for me to my worthy uncle.

Lip to lip, heart to heart, they stood, giving tow for yow, all unconscious of the dark face frowning upon them through the aperture. Slowly and noiselessly Danstan Kennedy turned away, and meeting a servant said,—

"Do not tell Mr. Rapert I have been in," and so left the house again.

CHAPTER IV.

RUFERT went down to Peckerton where he was received with effusion. Everybody was ready to make much of the successful young student; and people were not likely to forget either that he was Admiral Kennedy's only either that he was Admiral Kennedy's only son, and heir to a very fine unencumbered property. The Admiral himself looked almost absurdly proud of Rupert as he entered Mrs. Masson's drawing-room with him. Was there another young fellow present who could compare with him in physique or comeliness? Then, too, what a charm there was in his bright, frank ways and speech!

"The woman he marries will be the luckiest woman on earth!" was his unspoken thought.

As for Rupert he was a little graver than as for Kupers he was a little graver than usual, knewing that on the morrow he would deal his father's pride a bitter blow; and the love between them was so deep and real that he hated the mere idea of paining him. But he had had enough of secresy, and he owed it to Kitty to acknowledge her before all his small world.

In the meantime the circle would be a secret.

In the meantime the girl wasfull of anxiety oncerning the way in which the Admiral would receive Rapert's confession, and too much absorbed in her own thoughts to notice thestern and condemning look in Mr. Kennedy's eyes. He said nothing to his wife of his discovery that night, but brooded over it, trying to see the best course of action; and in the morning he had made his decision.
"Eunice," he said," Kitty Romayne must leave here."

"Leave here!" the lady exclaimed, sur-prisedly. "Why, Dunstan?"
Then he told his story, stigmatising Kitty as artful and designing, and Rapert not one bit better than the general run of young men. But for once the meek wife dared to question his wisdom.

"Kitty is not the sort of girl to indulge in "Attsy is not the sore of girl to indulge in idle or foolish fittetations, and if Ropert has addressed her in the language of love I am quite sure his intentions are honourable. And Kitsy is pretty and refined enough to be any man's wife."

"Class distinctions must be observed," Mr. Kennedy answered coldly. "I shall, however, say nothing to the girl until I have seen Arnold. If he chooses to approve such a mésalliance, of course I have nothing more to mesautrance, of course I have nothing more to say on the subject. I am now going to tele-graph him to come here at once; and you understand, Eunice, I will not permit you to hold any intercourse with Kussy Romayne until I have talked matters over with my brother."

much disturbed she was, spent the greater part of that day abroad.

The Admiral was talking gaily to a group of ladies when his brother's telegram was handed to him. It read;—

"Come at ones; important business. Meet you at Baker-street. Say nothing to Rapert." "What the decos is up?" the Admiral said to himself. Then aloud," My dear Mrs. Maston, I am afraid I must run away from you, import-am afraid I must run away from you, important business calls me to town; but if possible I will get back to-morrow."

"I hope it is nothing unpleasant," his hostess said cordially. "And oh! how we shall miss you. You have been the life and soul of our little party, and I am quite afraid the ladies will not forgive your desertion."

"Not desertion, madam," gallantly. "I shall return with all possible speed, and mine will be the loss. If you will excuse me I will make my few preparations and be off. I find I have no time to spare."

As he went up to his room he met Rupert.

As he went up to his room he met Rapert.

"Oh, I'm glad to find you alone father. I have something I want to tell you."

"Sorry I can't stay to hear it now, my boy, but I am called away on business. Shall be back to morrow; keep your news till then. I have not a moment to spare," And so Rupert's confession was not made.

The day was closing in when the old gentle-man reached Baker-street, where his brother, grim and tall, was waiting him. In the wan-ing light he looked very saturnine and forbid-ing light he looked very savurance and ding.

"Well, Dunstan," said the sailor, "what's the row? Why the dence have you hurried me up to town in such a mysterious fashion? It's nothing pleasant, I'll be bound."

"You are right," grimly; "but get in. I'll tell you all as we drive home."

And he did, not sparing poor Kitty in the least. He laid bare all her little story to the Admiral, and quite unconsiously boasted of his own charity; lamented that Rupert had got into mischief whilst in his house, and under his care, as it were, and ended by saying,—

ing,—
"Now, Arnold, I hardly think you would permit an alliance between these two; and you would not have your son play the villain!"

"By Heaven! I'd disown him if he did.
But," with a fierce oath, "a Kennedy deserves something better than a nameless wench for his wife. Look here, Dunstan, I'll see the girl, and if she's sensible I'll compromise the matter with her; but if Rupert has made her any promise, and she keeps him to it, I'll wash my hands of him. But I never will receive such a designing little hussey as my daughter."
"That is not to be thought of; but I am cover to eav Ednice is very much attached to sorry to say Eunice is very much attached to this young person, and I am afraid we chall have some trouble with her. But I am master have some trouble with her. But I am master in my own house, and so I have resolved to send Kitty Romayne packing to-morrow. I think I know of a suitable situation for her, where she can be carefully guarded. Greatly as the deserves punishment I cannot send her homeless into the world."

"Great Soot, no!" and the Admiral made as an expression more forcible than polita.

use of an expression more forcible than polite. His brother shuddered.

His brother shuddered.

"You have not overcome your unhappy habit, Arnold?" he said.

"No, nor never shall; but we need not quarrel about shat. You use your own set of phrases, and leave me free to use mine. Here we are! Wnew! what a gloomy old place it is! It would kill me if I attempted to live in it."

Without a word of reply Mr. Kennedy led the way into the hall and from thence into his study, where the light was already failing fast.

understand, Eunice, I will not permit you to hold any intercourse with Kitsy Romayne until I have talked matters over with my brother."

She knew his iron will and inflexible determination too well to offer any further opposition; and afraid lest Kitsy should guess, from a momentry glimpse of her facs, how for Heaven's sake, don't light the gas. I hate the nev he as it has ser dea pro J bitt the has hor aris She this her and effe

pote ma substantial per monital per monita bed asie bell she han her M and down pacin back Miss of the term o

SI

of D few The

and her to see a weman's confusion or distress, and to see a wemen's contains or district, and there's quite light enough for us to talk by."

"Any ou please," and, ringing a built he bade a servant send Kitty to them;

The Admiral, talk and broad shouldered, stood before one of the windows fidgeting with a orlmon blind tassel; and wishing the affair well come.

Mr. Kennedy had dropped into his chair, and waited motionless and impassive for the

A light step in the hall, a hand upon the door; and then, as the sailor turned, he saw in the dim light a slender young figure, which paused timidly, and heard a sweet, low voice

ssy,—
"You sent for me, Mr. Kennedy!" and through its sweetness there run a tremor as of

"Yes. Come in and shut the door! " And when she had obeyed he turned to his brother with a wave of the hand. "This is Admiral Kennedy, Mr. Rupert's father, and admirar hemosy, his, respects rather, and he wishes to know what understuding exits between his son and you?"

She caught her breath shappy, and for a moment was silent. Then she asked, scarcely

above a whisper,—
"Has not Mr. Rupert told him?"

"He has had no chance," the sailor answered, bluffly. "It was my brother who sent for me and told me a most astounding piece of news Look here, young woman, I don't mean to be hard upon you; but if you think for a mo-ment I shall admit you into my family you are mistaken: So, if there is any foolish firtation between you and my boy it must end at at once and for ever. Be hancet with me, and tell me what understanding there is between you?"

She tried to speak, but failed twice; and the Admiral, whose heart was soft enough; how ever rough his manner, said, in an almost kindly tone,-

"Now, my girl, don's be alraid to speak the truth. You have only been a little foolish, and Ru is a hundsome young scamp; but you'll be wise to confess all now, and to save further

She spoke then, with a sweet, unconscious

"Five months ago Mr. Kennedy asked me to be his wife, and I promised—conditionally." "What! And you have been deceiving my brother and myself se long?"

"Sir, Rupert feared your opposition, and wished to wait until he had taken his degree before bronching the subject. He did not intend deseit."

"Probably not," savagely. "And may I ask what were your conditions?"

'That he would not hold me to my promise if in any way it endangered his future welfare."

"You are an astute young lady, and it seems have no interstion of sharing poverty. with my son. I am afraid year love is of a very material type."

The hos blood flooded the poor girl's face.

She was glad the gathering darkness hid her emotion from her persecutors. Her voice was steadier than before, when she answered his taunt .-

"I did not suppose, sir, yeu would judge me kindly or correctly. I could not hope for that. But, much as you wrong me, at least believe me when I say that I esteem my lover's happiness before my own; and rather than injure him I will submit to any conditions you may exact or impose."

"Are you willing to relinquish all claim to him?"

him?"
"Not willing, sir, but ready it the need arises," she answered, bravely.
"It has already arisen. I admit my sen has not behaved well to you, but you must have felt from the beginning that such an alliance as he proposed would be meas dis-tasteful to his family. I blame him greatly,

"But the greater blame rests on this young erson," broke in Mr. Kennedy, "She has wiffully and persistently deceived those who the Admiral in a most uncomfortable state of resound her from want or shame; she has mind. added ingratitude to her other sing

"Softly, settly brother! It isn't fair to lay so much upon the woman's shoulders. That just what Adam did, and men have done over and over again since his day, and it's a cowardly trick. Miss Romanne, I blame you less than I do my son. You had everything to gain by a marriage with him; but he has no excuse for forgetting what is due to his family and his position. I don't want to be hard with you; but it is wiser that I should place matters before you very plainly, to prevent all future misunderstandings. If Rupert persists in this folly, from the day he marries you he no longer my sen. I wash my hands of him. You know what that means for him-poverty in lieu of riches, for I swear not a penny of mine shall ever come to him. "You can-not love him if you are willing to pull him down to your own level, to see him drag out his life in poverty and despair. Girl, in a little while he would caree the day he met you."

She clasped her hands over her tortured heart, and said under her breath,-

"You need say no more. I am a poor girl, all alone and friendless, and perhaps I am rightly panished for my presumption; but I —even I—am not without my pride. You need have no further fear of me. I will not force myself upon one who so misjadges me as you have done; and, sir, although you muck at my love, and choose to think me mercenary, can afford to smile, knowing my own

"If you loved your son as I have done, as I always shall, you would understand me better. You would place his happiness first: I promise here and now, selemnly as though I were dying, that without your consent I will neither see nor communicate with him any well. I will not spoil his life or embisser his days. He is quite, quite free, and may Heaven make him as happy as you have made

Her face shone ghantly white through the gathering dush; her great dark eyes glowed like stars, and the admiral's honest heart was smitten with admiration and pity for her. Let her be what she might-adventuress, intriguante, she had great admired nothing so much. courage, and he

"I believe you will keep your promise," he id, almost gently, "and I am much obliged said, almost to you for giving me so little trouble. If you will allow me, I shall be happy to recompense you in a measure for your disappointment," and he took out his pocket-book.

But he was hardly prepared for the indigna-tion with which she realised his intention. "How dare you so insult me?" she cried.

"Oh! this is worse than all! Poor and obsoure as my father was, he would have scorned to have offered money as an equivalent for blighted hopes and a broken hears. I am clad your son will never know what should be your

"I-I-upon my soul, Dansian, speak for me.

There is no need. This young person is bent on making a scene. You do not under-stand her class as I do. To morrow she will doubtless be quite ready to accept your generous gift."

"Oh, cruel! cruel! Mr. Kennedy, is this the charity you preach?"

"That will do, Romayne; there is no need for further speech. I have done my best for you, and you have rewarded me with basest ingratitude and deceit. I can no longer allow my wife to associate with you. But I will not onet you utterly adrift. To morrow I will take you to a new home, where you will be carefully guarded."

"No, sir. To morrow I shall know how to help myself. I am not ungrateful, but I am human, and I have already borne too much,"

CHAPTER V.

She went slowly up to her own room, her heart like lead within her bosom; but she could not cry. She was full of passionate indignation against Mr. Kennedy and the Admiral.

How date he, Ruperi's father, offer her a bribs to forego her love? What manner of woman did he believe her to be?

"Oh, father! oh, my father!" she meaned, "come back to me! The world is no hard. and I-I-my courage fails me. What I do? Oh! my heart, what shall I do? What shall

But she was not given to much weeping, this little waif, who was so sorely tossed and buffeted about on the cruel ocean of life; and when she had won back her self-control she began to pack her few belongings into her modest trunk.

She hardly remembered her patron's promise to find her another home; and she was fully resolved to free herself from his control.

His more presence in the house oppressed her with a sense of sickness and fear, must get away. She had promised to leave her lover free; but should he come to her pleading with her to forego her hard decision, she was horribly afraid lest she should yield, and so spoil all his life, mar all his prospects.

Night had come, and she sat before her open window, trying to think calmly, to map out the future that lay stretched before her in such a wful desolation.

What should she do with all the years of her life! She was so young, and sorrow had come so early to her. At her age most girls were glad; but she—oh! it was too hard, too

She was acarcely eighteen, and she might five to be eighty. Was every year of her life to be so heavy with grief as this? Then words she had read but the day before came to her memory to torture her afresh.

So short is our life, but with space for all things to forsake us.

A bitter delusion from which nought can awake us, Till Death's dogging footsteps at morn or at eve shall o'ertake us.

With a pitiful gesture she spread out her rms before her, and laying her face uponthem, whispered .-

"Dear Heaven, let me dis here, and now. Surely, death is mild compared with this agony of pain."

"Kisty! are you there?" whispered a voice from the doorway. "May I come in? On Kisty, how my heart aches for you." She lifted her head.

Mrs Remedy, do you know everything?"
"Yes," closing the door osutionaly, and advancing towards. "Mr. Kennedy has told me. Oh, you poor child, what good did you think could come of your love? Bit, Ritty dear, there is no girl I would like so well for Ropers's wife as you. It is catal, most order, that class prejudice should come between you and Ro. I wish you were me own child?"

and Ru: I wish you were my own child?

Oh thank you, thank you for these words;
they do me good. And you are not very angry with me that I bugged my secret se close!"

"Angry! No, child! I have only room in my heart for pity, you poor, helpless, friendliss little soul. But take corrage, Kuty, Rupert will never give you up. He is as true as steel.

"I know, I know. But oh'd dess friend, do

"I know, I know. But oh! deer friend, do you for a moment believe that I could endanger all his future happiness, maks his love for me a curse to him? No, no, not When I leave here I shall strive only to hide myself away from him—to be leave to him as untriy as though I were dead. If one must suffer, let it be ma. But oh! dear Mrs. Kennedy, if you should see him, tell him that I loved and love and with that she went from the room, leaving him with all my soul and strength; that I pray

ahe

naie

the r of ard ball ing.

and

and апа ber on's

his Tail. Bhe

her

dd

ste.

isp

of irla

100 ght

her nes

ake

her

100 n?

2" old

000 iel.

dir.

my least ert

do

070 on I erly let you love

he may forget me and be happy; that I was never worthy to be his wife; and—and in time he will learn this, and thank me for acting as I did.

Kitty, you are an angel!"

"Kitty, you are an angel!"
"Oh, no, no! only a loving woman. I think that if by the sacrifice of my life I could serve him I should not hesitate to die. Now, dear Mrs. Kennedy, tell me what Mr. Kennedy proposes doing with me?"
The lady hesitated. Her heart was a little hitter against her husband and his brother.
"Kitty, it is a shame," she said at last, "but they are so angry with you; and Mr. Kennedy has determined to take you to a servants' home. The matron is a very severe disciplinarian—a hard woman, without any affection. She wants an assistant, and Mr. Kennedy thinks you might suit, but he intends telling her all your story, and you would be under her all your story, and you would be under constant surveillance."

consists surveillance.

The hos blood flooded the girl's pale face, and she reared her head high; but by a great effort she refrained from speech, and Mrs.

effort she refrained from speech, and Mrs. Kennedy west on,—
"I will come and see you sometimes if I may, and I will do my best to interest my filends in you; and in the the meantime, my peor child, let me prove my affection in a material way. Mr. Kennedy will give your salary into the matron's hands, to be spent as the set sit; but I cannot let you go from me penniless and helpless. Kitty dear, it is not much I can give you, only three pounds, but it will help you a little. Take it, and let me go before my absence is discovered."

Just a moment the girl hesitated, and the hely presed is the more upen her.

"If not as a gift, accept it as a loan," she said, and Kitty answered with a sob;—
"Are lean then, and Heavern blees you for all your goodness," and kiested the kindly hand

"Ara loan then, and Heaven blees you for all your goodness," and kiesed the kindly hand with passionate gratitude. "I will repay you setton as I can; and, I would like to think you will plead with Rupert for his father—after all it is natural he should be angry. And tell him not to try to find me, or he will drive me on to some desperate step."
"I will tell him all you say. And now, Kitty dat, I must go or my absence will be noticed. Perhaps I shall not see you any more, before you leave us; so kies me now, child, and let us say good-bye.

you have us, and the elder woman's hands strayed lovingly over the other's dark, soft tresses. Then she gently set her saide, interests. Then she gently set her aside, inraed-lowly and sorrowfully away, and went on doing the door noiselessly behind her.

Kity went back to her seat by the window.

"Teach: Heaven!" also whispered, "I have helpnow; and I will no longer be the puppet of his will. If I cannot get work I can die. But I will do my best, for her sake, who has been as a mother to ma."

mother to me.

without disrobing she lay down upon her bed, and, despite her sorrow, soon fell fast aleep, and did not wake until the breakfast bell was ringing. Then, starting up hurriedly, the smoothed her hair, washed her face and hade and straightening the granupled folding hands, and, straightening the crumpled folds of ber dress, waited for the next act of the drama.

Martha brought up her breaktast of weak tea and thick bread and butter; and as she set it down with a clatter remarked,—

"Master says you're to have your things packed by twelve. He and the misses are solid to a Temperance Lecture; and won't be had till back till noon; so you've got plenty of time, Miss Kissy."

"Very well, Martha; I shall be ready. You

She tried to eat, but could not; her brain was in a whirt, and she was sick with excitement. Her one thought was to get away, to be free of Dunian Kennedy's barsh espervision; and at the morning wore by she began to pack a few necessary articles in a small Gladstone. Then she wrote a short letter to Mrs. Kennedy, and having realed and directed it, she watched her opportunity to escape. Stealing out of her room to reconnoitre she saw the hall was empty, and the door slightly sjar. In an instant she ran downstairs, and in less time than it takes to tell found herself standing, in the sunny street.

There was no time to lose!

At any moment the elergyman might return, and she was wofully afraid of his influence over her. What should she do? Then, like an inspiration, came the thought of a woman she had known for many years; a decent body who had taken a small house at Shepherd's Bush, which she let out in apartments, She would go to her; and surely, before her small capital was exhausted, she would find some thing to do.

So to Shepherd's Bush she went; and there was great consternation at the Vicarage when her flight was discovered. The old sailor regretted his harshness, and was ready to offer an almost fabulous reward for any authentic information concerning the lost girl. After all, she was little more than a child, and her love for Rupers might have been genuine. Danstan

Kennedy smiled grimly,—
"Brother you don't know these people as I "Brother you don't know these people as I do. They are as full of wiles as a fox. In a short while Kitty Romayne will reappear with some plausible story, and soliciting further help."

"For shame, Donatan!"

The voice was Mrs. Kennedy's, and she stood flushed and tearful in the open door-

"Is this the charity you preach, the charity which 'thinketh no evil?' Kitty Romayne is which 'thinketh no evil?' Kitty Romayne is as good and modest a girl as any under the sun, and no man need be ashamed to make her his wife. I hope you are both satisfied with your work. It is manly to drive a poor orphan from her only shelter. Brother, have you thought what Ropert will say when he learns the truth?"
"Ednice!" her husband said, sternly, "be quiet!" het for once she was without fear.

She had broken through the long habit of half servile submission, and her woman's heart had grown suddenly brave.

"I must speak; I have been a coward to keep silent so long. For aught we know to the contrary, that poor girt has found a rest where so many have found it before her; and, if so, how will you feel with the thought of her death always upon your conscience? See, here is her last message! Take it and read it, Arnold. I—I cannot."

With his ruddy face grown pale, the Admiral took the short note Kitty bad left for Mrs. Kennedy, and read it through in utter silence; but Eunice knew what he suffered by his expression.

"My Dear and Honoured Friend,—
"In going away from you thus I feel I am acting for the best. I see now I should never have listened to Mr. Repert Kennedy, although, indeed, I fear were the temptation again to assail me I should again account to it. Do not seek to find me. I will not be found, and I pray you help him to forget one whose only claim upon him was her great love to him. I know my flight will prejudice some against me; but indeed—indeed I cannot live the life Mr. Kennedy has planned for me. It would madden me. And why should I, who am no oriminal, be subjected to such degradation as Mr. Kennedy proposes for me?
I will try to earn my own livelihood honestly, and if I fail—well, there is always the river.
One thing more, dear friend. Do not let Rupert guess the share his father has had in this most "MY DEAR AND HONOURED FRIEND,guess the share his father has had in this most unhappy bushiess. I loved my own dear parent too well to wish any estrangement between them; and I am quite sure Admiral Kennedy acted as he believed for the best. Good-bye; love me and pray for me still!"

The sailer cleared his threat before he ven-tured to speak; then he said somewhat unsteadily,—
"I wish I had not been quite so harsh. After all, the girl seems to have some right feeling

"You are easily deceived, Arnold. This was "None to far as I am aware. Oh, Ru, you written wish a view to effect," said the clergy-poor boy, how sorry I am for you; and indeed map. "Well, I wash my hands of her I am grieved too, for your father. It is hard entirely. But what explanation shall you give, Rupert?"

"If he comes to me I shall tell him the truth," Mrs. Kennedy broke in. "He ought to know it. Poor Kitty! poor child! If ever you pray, Arnold, don't forget to entreat Heaven her death may not lie at your door," and with that Eunice Kennedy swept from the room.

"I wish;" said her brother in law, as he wiped his heated face, "yes, upon my soul, I wish I had not meddled in this matter. Things would have righted themselves without my interference. In time the young people would have grown tired of each other."

people would have grown tired of each other."

"Kitty Romayne had every inducement to tire of Rupert," entered the other.

"Oh, hang it, Dunstan, give the girl credit for some real feeling; and my boy is hand-some and good enough to win any girl's heart. What the plague shall I say to him to-morrow, for of course he must be told? And upon my henour I'd rather face a crossodile than Rupert under groth disquestance." than Rupert under such circumstances.

"You reverse the order of things and stand in awe of your son. Why, in a year or two he will thank you for your present action." "I hope so, I'm sure; but I very much doubt it. He's not fickle."

Here the luncheon bell rang, and Mr. Kennedy led the way to the room where it was served. To his surprise Ennice was not

"Where is your mistress?" he asked of the servant in waiting.

"In her own room, sir. She said she was not well enough to come down, and hoped you would excuse her."

The meal passed in a most uncomfortable silence. Admiral Kennedy's conscience was not easy with regard to Kitty, and every time he thought of the bribe he had offered his face ne thought of the bribe he had offered his face grew hot with shame and self corn.

"I behaved like a brute," he thought.

"What would the boy say it he knew all?"

That night he left for Peckerson without seeing Eunice again, and Dunstan Kennedy felt relieved by his departure.

CHAPTER VI.

"AUNT, where is Kitty?"

The lady dropped her work with a little

"Rupert! Oh, my poor boy!" and both hands went out to meet his. "You know all?"

"Yes, all the shameInl, scandslows story, and I left Peckerton at once. Can't you'tell me anything of my poor girl?"
Her eyes filled with tears as the looked into the handsome, haggard young face, which had been so bonny so short awhile age, and her voice was broken as the said,
"I know no more than you have heard. Since she left us not a line or a message has resolved me from her, and sometimes. Heaven reached me from her, and sometimes, Heaven help me! I think she is dead."

"No, no!" he cried, vehemently, "not that, aunt, I dare not face such a thought! I should go mad it I believed it. Tell me all you can about her flight; perhaps we may yet be able to trace her."

"I can tell you nothing you do not already know. Rupert, on what terms are you with your father?"

"The very worst."

your lather?" moodily. He threatene if I ever marry Kitty to disinherit me, and I have sworn to marry no one else. I am not going back to Peckerton; I mean to spend all my energies in finding her, and in October I begin to walk St. George's. I wish with all my heart I had chosen some less expensive profession, so that I might the seoper have a home to offer Kitty, if I find her. Had she any friends with whom she could take refuge for a time?"

Nov

A w: reagain Samuel and reagain shall be seen a wind of samuel shall be samuel shall

"1 8

hai ar beach

you re

Lat

sun si Kit

all fife se fai

to her Shin said e Oad warm sigh : within saous who v pey's "Ill oap, " what are tire coming Kitt a moore " Y with with as ho said, without Give you or the w tail h

"I

there should be any cloud between you; he loves you so."

"A man shall leave father and mother and cleave to his wife," the young man said, sternly, "and I am bound to Kitty by every tie of honour and of love. Until my father reognises this we are best apart."

Ennice was half afraid of the tempest she had helped to raise.

"Rupert, he has only you; and he is gotting d. Don't be hard."

The young stern face never softened, the deep blue eyes never lost their resentful look. "If I find Kitty safe and well, I will think then of reconciliation—not before,"

Think what you owe your father, how all his hopes are centred in you?" she pleaded, faying her hand on his.

"I am not likely to forget; but he has gone too far. Now tell me, have you any idea where she has gone—what she intends doing?"

"I have none; but perhaps later I shall have some happy inspiration. In the meanwhile, Rupert, you must have some refresh. ment; and, of course, you will occupy your old

"No, thank you. I have taken apartments close by, and shall endeavour to see you daily. But under the circumstances I cannot remain ere," and from that he would not go.

It was with wet eyes Eunice Kennedy saw him go.

"If I had such a gallant son," she said, "I could not so wound him. It breaks my heart to see his haggard young face and sunken eyes.

Heaven send a happy ending to his love."

Even whilst she watched him go, Kisty sat poring over the long, list of advertisements contained in the Daily Telegraph; but at present she had found nothing to suit her, and her courage was beginning to fall her. Day by day her small store of money was wasting, and when it was gone what should she do? Sud-denly the light flashed into her eyes, and a int flush rose to her cheeks.

* Surely I am competent to fill this situashe said, under her breath, and then read aloud,-

"Wanted.-For a superior lodging house, a young lady to help in management and keep accounts; must be active, and an early riser. Salary £15, and home comforts.—Apply to dfrs. Shippey, 5, Albuda-terrace, Corney-

She wasted very little time in replying, giving as her referee the good woman with whom she lodged, and then she waited giving as her referse the good woman with whom she lodged, and then she waited anxionaly for Mrs. Shippsy's reply.

"I should be glad to go," she thought as she tossed restlessly to and fro that night. "Corneystone is such a long way from London, and such an isolated place, that no one will ever think to look for me there."

The next two days she was in a fever of anxiety, and at night a letter came for her addressed in a very uneducated hand. It ran

"DEAR MISS,-

"In reply to yours, I would like to say that I want a young lady who can do up accunts, and see arfter the cumfort of the lodgers. You seam as if you might sute, and if you can give me a good carakter I shall be glad to see you here next Monday. I can promise you a good home, and a muther's care.—Yours fatheful, "REDECCA SHIPPAY."

Poor Kitty's heart sank a little as she read this unique letter, but she was not in a posi-tion to be particular, so she went to her land-

"Mrs. Todd, will you give me a character for respectability?" she asked, with a faint

"To be sure, miss! Have you got something to do at last? Dear, dear, I am glad. There, pass me my writing case, and let me say all I can for you. Let me see, 'Young, ladylike, pretty and well-educated; of most respectable parentage.' Will that do?"

"I am afraid you have praised me too highly," said Kitty, with a little weary smile; "but, oh! I hope I shall be the successful candidate, for my money is wasting so fast. Mrs. Todd, I am rather doubtful about a lady who misspells so dreadfully. I picture her as a typical boarding house keeper, and fancy life will not be too pleasant with her."
"Oh, nonsense!" said the other. "My own mother could neither read nor write, and yet she was a lady! I never knew her say an unkind word or do a mean trick, and that more than I could say for a good many real born ladies I've met. And Miss Kitty, if you aren't comfortable, remember you can always come back here.

The days slipped by, and on Saturday a note from Mrs. Shippey reached the young orphan. It was short, and to the point.
"Miss Romayne may cum on Monday, and Mrs. Shippey will be glad if she will take the first trans from Uxbridge Station; it gets so Corneystone at eleven fourty five."

So on Monday Kitty bade Mrs. Todd goodbye, and started on her long journey. It was through a picturesque country, and she found many objects of interest to occupy her atten-tion. But for the thought of Rupert she would have been almost happy.

Corneystone was a small watering place on the south coast, and a favourite town with invalids in the winter months, on account of its mildness. The scenery was good, the beach pleasant, and it boasted a grand stretch of sea. As Kitty was whirled up to the little platform her eyes brightened, and a faint platform her eyes originence, and a limited flush rose to her cheeks.

"If only Mrs. Shippey is a decent body I may rest here. The place is very lovely!" and as she thought thus the train drew up.

On the platform stood a comely woman of forty or more, carefully and even elegantly dressed, and her dark eyes wandered restlessly from window to window until they rested on Kitty's dainty face. Then she went forward, and as the girl alighted said,—

Ain's you Miss Romayne?"

Kitsy answered in the affirmative, and the other offered her hand cordially.
"I knew I couldn't be mistaken; I never am, my dear. I'd a sort of notion what you'd be like, and I ain't disappointed. Here's the cab; jump in. It ain't far to Albuda terrace, but I'm no great shakes at walking."

Her manner was totally devoid of refine-ment, but very kind; and when once they vere seated in the cab she turned and gave her pale companion a hearty kies.

That's your welcome, my dear, and I hope you'll be happy here. I like your face, and I think we'il get on fine together. I always have plenty of lodgers, and so I'd need; for I ain't got a penny beyond what I earn. You see, my dear, I married above me; and when my husband died his folks didn't take any more notice of me. Then, I'm that ignorant I can't talk to the ladies as I should, and I can't saik to the ladies as I should, and I make awful mistakes in their bills which is bad for both parties. So at last I thought I'd advertise for a young lady to help me. I don't want you to do menial work, my dear. I've got two good servants as ever was. Well, here we are; and I say I'm glad, for there's no place like home."

Kitty gave one quick, half-scared look at the house; then her tired face brightened. It was a handsome, red brick building, picked out with white stone, and before the drawingroom windows rose a substantial baloony, rich with blossoms and evergreens. The ourtains were spotlessly white, and every pane of glass winked and blinked in the broad, noon-day glare.

"It ain't a bad place is it? said Mrs.

Shippey complacently, "and what's more it's my own. Now come in do. You must be dying for a bite and a sup." and unheeding any rethe old tartar myself; so don't worry or fash monstrance she drew Kitty into a small, nicelyfurnished room, where a very substantial meal hadn't come to Albuda terrace."

"You only want a bit more colour in your face to make you perfect," she said, as they dis-cussed the dainties before them, "and this is just the sort of place to get it. I am sure I hope you'll be happy. I know I'll do my best to make you so."

And she was as good as her word. Thoroughly illiterate, she was yet thoroughly kind, and had a certain innate delicacy many a lady might have envied. Kitty found plenty to do; but her work was so sweetened by kindness, her comfort so much considered, that but for the thought of Rapert would have been quite happy.

Every day Mrs. Shippey sent her to walk on the beach, or would persuade her to row over to a small island lying at a short distance from them, and soon the girl grew quite expert with the soulls. This island, called St. Olafs, was a favourite place for picnics, but it was quite uninhabitable, because at high tide it was totally submerged, and consequently dangerous to any passing vessel.

The months were by, and Kitty daily gathered fresh strength and beauty; but it hur Mrs. Shippey often to see the serrowful shadows in her eyes, the downward droop of the sweet mouth. Touched by her goodness Kitty had confided her little story to her, suppressing nothing but names, and it was the landledy's desire that she should forget her gentleman desire that and should torget up gesteman lover. She noticed that one or two young tradesmen were particularly attentive to her protégée, and for her own sake as well as Kitty's she wished the girl to settle down at Corneystone.

"You'd be happier, my dear," she said, "than if you married into a family as wouldn't acknowledge you. But Kitty shook her head.

"I shall never marry unless I marry Rapers, and that will never be, unless his father relents. I will not hurt him."

"But don't you think you're hurting him in keeping yourself hid up from him? And if he's a man he'll laugh at his friends, and learn to get a living for you and him."

"You forget. He has never known anything but lexery. Poverty would be doubly hard for him to bear." and there the subject ended. But Kitty thought to herself. " Forget you, my darling I Ab, no, no, no! You stooped from your high estate to love me; you honoured me all women ; and so long as I live I will be faithful and true, even though we never mest sgain, and you (forgetting me) take another love to yourself."

So November came, unusually mild and bright, and one morning, when Kitty returned from a shopping expedition, Mrs. Shippey met her in the hall, with every appearance of "What has happened?" said Kitty, tossing aside hat and muff.

"Oh! my dear, I feel quite important. The drawing room floor is taken by such a nice old gentleman—and big swell too, Admiral Ken-nedy. We must try to make him comfort-

Kitty stared at her with wide eyes, and her face grew so suddenly white that Mrs. Ship.

pey said,—
"Ain's you well, dear? What is it? Lot!
you look like a ghost!"
"It is nothing; I was only a little startled.

Dear Mrs. Shippey, do not let me sel lodger. He—he is Rupert's father." "You don's say so! Well, I'm se do not let me see the new

Well, I'm sorry I let him the rooms, the old wretch; but I don't see very well how I can afford to send him packing."

"Do nothing of the sort. Why should you! I question if he would know me again, and after all I need not see him. If you let Jano wait upon him I will undertake to do her

"Indeed, you won't," bluntly. "I'll see to tre I

ighly

nany

ered.

walk

row

Anos

quite d St. nica

10 AS laily hurt

dows week

dy's min nang a at ead.

m in be's

hing d for

dar. your aith.

and

rned

ssing

The old Ken-fort

Ship.

Lor

tled.

new

I let you? , and Jane o her

fash ish he

A WEEK passed slowly by, and, fearful of magnition, Kitty kept herself well hidden. Ste refused to take her daily walk, or the almost daily row to Ss. Olat's, and Mrs. Shippey grambled that she was growing pale and meanly."

Once she caught a glimpse of Admiral fennedy, and her tender heart ached at the change she saw in him. Her eyes (keener change and saw in this. Let eyes (seemer than his) had pierced through the gloom on that June night, and seen a bronzed, healthy tes; now the cheeks had fallen in, and the eps were very sombre.

She guessed then that Rupert and he had quartiled terribly, and that no reconciliation ad taken place since ad taken place since.

Nothing was harder to bear than that nowledge. Rupert disgraced, perhaps diswas for her sake! Oh, she was not worthy such love and such sacrifice.

She had been tossed hither and thither on the ocean of life; she had weathered many a som, soffered many a hardship, but nothing emed so hard to her as this.

"I wish he had never seen me," she said usin and again. "He was happy and con-inted natil then. Oh, love! my love! I who would die to ensure your welfare have brought jou nothing but trouble."

Brooding much over Rapert's troubles stole all her brightness from her, and Mrs. Shippey

"New," she said, in an authoritative tone,
"New," she said, in an authoritative tone,
"I sin's going to stand this nonsense any longer. Who is the Admiral that you need tarhim? And ten chances to one he wouldn's tar hm? And ten chances to one he wouldn't knew you it he met you; so just put on your his and cloak, and go for a good walk along the bash. There, I won't take any refusal; years looking as pale as a Christmas rose. Polks il he saying I starve you."

Laughing a little Kitty dressed and went out It was a fine, clear day, with the dightest suspicion of frost, and before her the males spread like a sheet of silver, for the makes suspection of frost, and before her the was keyspread like a sheet of silver, for the was stone full upon it. Kiny drew a deep breath of delight. After allife, was worth living when the world was

"If only we were together," she whispered to bereit, "how happy we could be here!"

She went along the narrow path by the diffs, and the rapid walking brought a slight dash to the dainty face, a light to the usually ad area.

Oa and on she went, until the fading light sigh she set her face towards home, and was within sight of Albuda terrace when she was stoosted by "Darkey Jim," an old boatman

Part to bee in gesting him off. The tide's time to lose in getting him off. The tide's omin' up fact nov Kitty stood with her hand shading her eyes moment; then she said,—

"Yes, Jim, it is a man, and there is no We must get him off the island with all possible speed.

"The sea is rollin', miss; and I don't know a how I could manage the boat alone," Jim ald debionaly.

"I'll go with you. I am not afraid," and without further parley she got into the boat.
"Give me the sculle, Jim. When I am tired you can take them," and suiting the action to the word she made for the island.

The wind had changed now, and the sea was running high; but Kitsy's heart did not lal her, and Darkey Jim did not know what all her, and Darkey Jim did not know what far meant. He rowed in silence for some time, then he said,—

"I guessed something was amiss more than a hour ago, for I saw a 'hempty' boat go allin' off towards Rockyville, and I said, 'There's been a hacoident.' Only you see,

Kitty made no reply. She was horribly alive to the rising of the tide; there was such a little strip of land left now for the unfortunate man to stand firm upon. She lifted her voice, and cried to him to be of good lifted her voice, and cried to him to be of good cheer. It was a very faint shout that answered her. But in less time than she had shought possible they reached the island; and heedless of the rushing water, of all save the peril in which one man stood, Kitty sprang out, and gathering her skirts about her, waded through the waves and came at last to Admiral Kennedy!

For a moment she was staggered, but quickly recovering herself, she said,—

"Come at once! We have no time to lose! How ill you look? Lean on me, and you can tell us how your accident happened as we go homewards."

homewards."
"I am faint," the Admiral answered, in a weak voice. "I've been here nearly three hours, and my arm is anything but easy. I can't tell you how it happened, but as I was stepping from my boat it shot from under me and landed me on the shingle with my arm doubled under me, and I reckon it."

me and landed me on the shingle with my arm doubled under me, and I reckon it's broken. I think I fainted. Anyhow, when I realised what had happened my boat was far enough out at sea."
"Come," said Kitty, offering her hand, "we must be going. Delay is dangerous. Where shall we take you?"
"To Abuda-terrace, please" (quite meekly).
"My landlady is Mrs. Shippey."
"Then you are Admiral Kannedy. Mrs. Shippey has told me about you. I am her clerk, assistant and friend. Steady, please. The sea is rougher than I could wish," and gently as she could she drew him to the little boat, where Darkey Jim sat the picture of boat, where Darkey Jim sat the product impatience.

"Hurry up, miss," he said. "It ain't too pleasant along this 'ere coast at dark, and it's at Albuda terrace the Admiral turned gratefully to Kitty.

"You are a good and brave girl, and as pretty as you are brave. You have saved my life to day, and there is nothing you can ask that I will refuse you. Tell me your name, my dear."

"They call me Kitty," she answered, quietly, and turned away.

The Admiral had been very ill. He had broken his right arm very badly, and the westing he had got whilst stranded on St. Olat's had brought on a low fever, which prostrated him terribly. And in all, through all, he insisted on Kitty's attendance.

You have a sweet voice, my dear!" he i, "and it matches your face. If Heaven said, "and it matches your face. If Heaven had seen fit to give me a daughter I would have had her fashioned after your style. What are your people about to let you go out into the world like this, for I reckon Mrs. Snippey is not related to you?"

"On, no! but she is so kind to me, and I love her dearly. I have neither father nor mother, not a relative in all the wide world."

"Poor little git! But one day you will

"Poor little girl! But one day you will marry, and then all things will be changed and brightened for you!"

She made no answer, but he thought he saw the sheen of tears in her lovely eyes, and wondered a little over her emotion. He would have wondered still more could be have heard her cry a little later.

"Rupert! Rupert! my love, my love! Life is so hard to bear—so hard, and I am so

Daily she reads to the Admiral, and wrote the few letters he desired, but never a message was sent to the offending son; and often she wondered at this, often fretted in secret that Rupert should be cast out of his father's love. But there came a morning when the Admiral a whisper.

seemed unusually facetious, and nothing would please him save Kitty's journeying to her breath she said,— miss, my eyes ain't what they was, and though I though I heard shouts I couldn't see nothin' nohow."

Kitsy made no reply. She was horribly alive to the rising of the tide; there was another in the range of the tide; there was another in the range of the rising of the tide; there was a life in the range of the rising of th

"I want you to write a letter to my son; and I do not wish Miss—Miss—" "Miss Kitty," said the landlady, as he paneed.

"I don't wish Miss Kitty to know anything of it. By the way, what is her surname?"
"Well, really, sir, I can't see how that concerns you. She's never been called anything else but Miss Kitty since she came here. But I'm ready enough to write your letter, if you ain't too particular about spelling and writing."

"Sis down then," said the sailor. "I've been thinking, Mrs. Suippey, that my nurse and my son are well-suited to each other."

"Lor! sir, Miss Kithy's got a beau, and your son must be smart to cut him out," said Mrs. Shippey, with a mischievous gleam in her still handsome eyes. "But her sweetheart's father is a bit of a fool, and don't know when his son's well off, and won't hear of a wedding." Here the Admiral groaned, but Mrs. Shippey paid no heed to him, only went on coolly, "I'm ready now, sir, if you'll please to say what I'm to write."

So the Admiral diotated, and Mrs. Shippey wrote:—

wrote :-

" DEAR RUPERT,-

"Don't you think we have been strangers long enough? If you are willing to be friends I am. Don't trouble to answer this. If you are as sick as I am of this estrangement you will be with me to morrow. I expect you. A. KENNEDT."

"You are very restless to-day, said Kitty, as the Admiral went to the window for the fiftieth time. "Is not your arm so easy?"

"Yes, Miss Kitty, but I have a troublesome conscience, I'm afraid. Anyhow, I can't keep quiet. But you, child, sit down and talk to me. I like to hear your pleasant voice. I often wish you were my daughter; and I am not likely to forget you saved my life."

Her eyes shone through a mist of tears, as she answered, "I did very little for you, sir. I would do far more than that."

The door was opened with a flourish, and Mrs. Shippey said demurely—
"Your son, sir!"

The old man started up.

"Your son, sir!"
The old man started up.
"Welcome, Rapert! welcome a thousand times!" but the son's eyes had gone beyond him to that quiet figure, that sweet, startled face, and he gave a great ory "Kitty! Kitty!" and went towards her with outstretched arms. She forgot everything then—all her pain, all her sick longing and fears; even the Admiral's presence, as she ran into his embrace, sobbing out.—

"At last ! at last! Oh! Rupert, I am content

"At last! at last! Oh! Rupers, I am content now to die!"

"Eh! what?" cried the Admiral, "what the deuce does this mean?"

"This, father; that unless I marry Kitty I will never call any woman wife. Can't you see for yourself, father, she is just the one girl in the world for me?"

"Well, I'm blest," said the Admiral, "I have been regularly sold. Kitty, you small witch, come here. Can you ever forgive me my folly and harshness? I was stupid enough to think a girl must needs be a lady born to be worthy my son. Will you hiss me and call me father?"

Her sweet eyes shone through her happy

"I will love you for Rupert's sake," she said, and, bending, laid her fresh young lips to his.

"And I will be your dutiful and affectionate shild retain." child-father !

"And what to me, Kitty?" asked Rupert in

Nov

THE

THE

gregatil One

the me

FRIN

ballo, is buy the dress.

termin

Evan diminu since h

urmii

THE

attenti be deel eristier resilier one con in inspect.

Tan inspect the in the cone of last in law already to deep to the cone of the cone

Kate educate beautif dene up boys w was for Westph the pris German

Tite

lession lession lession are assistance have be the Vir

THE !

the imagined in Earl of more lu greater Earl is is now

INSTE

original Empres Indies i probabl Atlanti ion.

"Your loyal, loving wife; dearly devoted to you through all my days,"

All her trials now were ended, all the rough voyaging on the "ocean of life," and she was safe in the harbour now—the happiest wife and dughter, soon the happiest mother in all the land.

Dunatan Kennedy died suddenly, and his widow went to live with Rupert and his pretty wife; and his opposition to the marriage is a standing joke between her and the Admiral. Mrs. Shippey is not forgotten; and every summer she spends a whole blissful fortnight with "Miss Kitty and the babies," always declaring staunohy that, butfor her, the anion never would have taken place. And the Admiral—well, he simply worships Rupert's wife.

THE END.

FACETIÆ.

Ha: "I'll never marry a strong-minded woman." She: "No, I don't think you will." A GENTLANKE in homespun appears better than a and in a dress suit.

A raus word is often spoken in jest, but we always like it to be about some other fellow.

"How curious Maude Madeup's hair looks? Sort of streaky in colour." "Yes: I think she's gewing it on the instalment plan;"

Mns Ground says that if all fastionable people had to pay as they go, there would be fewer going.

A cirk whose face is her fortune stands just as poor a chance as the rest of the world at a bank counter.

JENNIE: "What a pretty face! Who is it, dear?" Madge: "Why, that's my latest photograph."

A Pancaution.—He: "We are coming to a tunnel. Are you not scared?" She: "Not a bit, if you take the cigar out of your mouth."

Mn. Honnower: "I wish you would help me out a little to day." Mr. Busy: "With pleasure. I'll hold open the door."

A women can conceal a headache that would make a man think that he was going to disright away.

JIMMY'S PRET VIEW OF THE OCEAN, -- "Oh, papa!" cried small Jimmy, as the wave recoded from the shore, "somebody's taken the stopper out and the water is all running off."

Would be Suiron: "Has your sister an eye for the beautiful?" Small Brother: "I guess so, for she told me it makes her eyes tired to look at you."

The collar stud has done more to release man from the tyranny of a woman than all the philosophical works of humanity ever printed.

No Sturring Think, -- "First Boarder: "Don't you always have a stuffy feeling in this house?" Second Boarder: "Not when we are in the dining room,"

Hz: "Why should you be so angry at me for stocking just one little kies?" She: "Any self-respecting woman would be angry at a man who kiesed her just ones."

"Will you love me when I'm old?" sang a malden of uncertain age. "Will I?" murmured a crussy old bachelor. "Do I? you mean!"

"THERE is only one cure for smoking," said the club man, "and that is death." "That isn't always sure," said the Presbyterian, significantly.

A woman never hits anything with a stone or a hammer, but fate itself cannot exceed the certainty with which the can jab a man in the eye with an umbrella.

Bassen: "Are you not a burglas?" Hanker: "No; a friend." Banker: "What are you doing in my bedroom at midnight?" Hanker: "Keeping watch." "Den't you know how to spell?" asked the exasperated teacher of the extremely phonetic boy. "Oh, yea," said the boy. "I know how to spell well enough, but the men who made the dictionaries don't seem to."

THE ARGUMENT FROM ANALOGY.—Polly (who has been asking her father's only dress-shirt before the fire): "Ob, mother, don't you think it is done enough now? It is quite brown."

Mann: "How far do you live from here, Mr. Hangaround?" Mr. H.: "Oh, nearly two miles." Mand (innocently): "It you should start now, what time would you get home?"

Must Have Been Small.—"Cholly had an idea yesterday." "What did he do with it?"
"Lost it. He had his cane in his mouth at the time it occurred to him, and before he could get it out he had forgotten the idea."

Hz (class of '90); "Did you hear that astonishing discovery they've made, that hair grows after death?" She: "Oh, I'm so glad! Maybe you'll have a moustache in heaven."

Magistrate (to old lady): "You have been convicted of drunketness seven times at this court," "Yes, your honour," "Disposed al—and you, an educated person, do not seem one bit sahamed." "No, your honour, I have got courage from my convictions."

Mm. Brimmen (alarmed): "My dear, what is the master?" Mrs. Blimber (sobbing): "That insulting old photographer sent back word with my crayon: "The original of this portrait is carefully preserved." The bateful thing."

DISTINGUISHED GRESS (at the seaside hotel):
"Garçon, you may hand me the menu. By the way, your face is estrangely familiar." Garçon:
"Possibly, sir. (proudly): I was a gness of this hotel last year." Distinguished Gress:
"Indeed. (Io himself): I was a waiter."

JESSE: "If that bull should attack us, what could you do?" Tom: "I could reach that fence in less than two seconds." Jesse: "Yes, but what could I do?" Tom: "You? Why, your parasol would keep his attention until I was eafely over."

"This isn't a menagerie," sharply observed an iracible weman to a man who was trying to force his way through the crowd at the door of the concert room. "No, I suppose not," returned the man, "or they wouldn't leave any of the animals to block up the entrang."

Trant (with tears in his eyes): "I do not ask you for money, sir, but what would you think if I should tell you I have had nothing to eas for forty-eight hours; and my poor wife and children are now starving in the street?" Practical Cisizen: "I'd think you were a list. Good-morning!"

Fashonable Wife: "Did you notice, dear, at the party last evening, how grandly our daugster Clara swept into the room?" Husband (with a grand): "Oh, yee; Clara can sweep into a room grandly enough, but when it comes to sweeping out a room she isn't there."

Miss Beauty: "Miss Plainface told me that you taught her to swim in two lessons, Mr. Dashing. I wish you would teach me!" Jack Dashing: "I'm sure I should be delighted, Miss Beauty." Miss Beauty: "And how many lessons do you think I should want?" Jack Dashing: "Oh, I think at least a doze."

Nor Wide Enough for Him.—The Rev. Mr. Hittemup (meeting Jobkins on his way home from the lodge): "Oh, my brother, I am pained to see you in this condition! Why have you erred so? Why de you not waik in the straight and narrow path?" Jobkins: "Why (hio) don't I shick to 2s (hio) shtraight an' narrow pach? If you (his) was as full 'ah! I am you'd want a heel shtreat tor waik in. No. (hie) narrow pachs? for me to (hio) night, shanks!"

Cor. Yerger: "I hear your son is going to get married." Judge Peterby: "Yes, he is about to become a Benedict." "Why dor! you make him wait until he is older and less get more sense." "Humph! If he should get a sensible spell he would not marry at all."

Things often seem to be sadly unever in this world, but sometimes justice is dote. Friend of the Family; "I tim straid you little follows don't always agree. For fiber sometimes, don't you?" Twins: Yeth, the thought so Well, who whips?" Twins: "Mamma wipth."

"I THISK photography is very interesting," she said to a young man who is in that fine. "Yes; it is." "I should like to have you make a picture of me." "With pleasure." "How would you prefer to take me?" He lobbed at her with a face that showed deep thought, and then replied, slowly but in a firm voice, "For better or for worse, by all means."

REV. CHARLES PROUNDTEXT (who has been writing his sermon, looking up suddenly): "Maria, will you take the children out of the room for a few minutes?" Mrs. Proundext (in surprise): "Certainly, my dear. Butare they annoying you?" Rev. Proundfext: "Not at all; but I have just dipped the gnm brush in the ink pot, and I would like to be at liberty to make a few remarks."

During a matrimonial dispute the wife of an aposthecary, as a last resort, tried to work on her husband's better feelings by bursing into tears. "What's the use of crying," said he, "there's nothing to be made out at tears. I have tested them obenically, and find they consist of an infinitesimal proportion of placephate of lime and a little chloride of seda; the rost is insipid, worthless water."

A LEARNED clorgyman was accounted in the following manner by an illiterate pracher who despised education. "Sir, you have been to college, I suppose?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "I am thankful," rejoined the latter, "that the Lord has opened my mouth to preach without learning." "A similar event," replied the former, "cocurred in Balasse's time, but such things are of rare cocurred at the present day."

"Jonn," said an experienced member of the Scotery of Friends, "I hear that then are going to be married." "You," replied John "I am." "Well, I have one little piece of advice to give thee, and that is, never married woman worth more than thou art. When I married my wife I was worth just fit; will lings, and she was worth sixty two; said when ever differences have countred between ne she has always thrown up the odd shiftings."

That eminent ditzen, Bristles: "New, Amy, did you tell that ass, who is going to saddle himself with you, that I won't have him continuously kissing you? Did you tell him he was just to kiss you once when he comeand once when he went away, and have done with it?" "Yes, pa," "And I suppose the young puppy called me names?" "Ne, ps, he said all right." "H'm! pretty sort of lover!" "Well, pa, he has never kissed mb before."

Nor many Sundays ago a Buffalo Sundayschool was invited to participate in a union service with another school a few blocks away, and formed in line with the superintendent at the head, and marched out of doots singled the superintendent's favourite hymn, "Holit the Fora." Bystanders stopped, and every one looked on at the beautiful sight of the proud superintendent marshalling his hadsome cohorts of carolling children up the street. Their singing charmed all hearen, too, but when they struck the second superior.

"See the mighty host advancing, Satan leading on "- somebody snickered, and the superiotender t dropped back to the rear to stak to the infant class.

ng to he is d has ould pould

ir in done, you fight thir,

h, I

you

He

in a y all basin

the ext

ext:

nun o be e of ing

are. hoy das

tlie

her

the ter;

66," 86 B

the hm.

ny a m I till-to ave tell the pe, miè

ray,

in: the and. the

MIN. za:

der t

SOCIETY.

THE Prince of Wales has a collection of over ore hundred and seventy-two walking sticks.

THE hair is worn as floffy and dry as pos-tible, so as to post out and look thick,

The experiment of electing a woman president of a synagogue is being tried by a congestion near Paris.

ORE New York woman makes her living by writing obituary poetry, and perhaps that is the most unique line of verse-writing yet

FRINGES, either of hanging threads or small alls, are much worn again, and you can by them by the yard to still almost any

The word has gone forth at last, and the desirence Gallery, once the head quarters of Greenery vallery " with the lines, is about to minate its artistic existence

Every one is very much struck with the simination in size of the Prince of Wales soo he went to Homburg. He was looking a much thinner and better at a recent wedding that it was a general subject of con-

THE Dake and Duchess of Fife are to make in Norfolk, at Castle Rising Hall, until largery, when they propose going to the milk of France for about three months.

Tur latest fashion in Parts is to pay a lady The latest fachion in Paris is to pay a lady similar by ordering all her apartments to be label with flowers sent by the friend who when to recall himself to her memory, in malliess for her return from a journey.

on rason that ladies' watches are usually an had timekeepers is that they are so impairly worm—hence have about three bytom of seven a widely different environ-

In Ring of Holland's bodily health has instant without any favourable change in it hasts condition. As he may live in this side for some time, the Minister buye at he induced Queen Emma to convent to the

Is indiced. Queen Emma to content to the Espacy she has always sought to avoid.

In living descendants of Queen Victoria said in the last a hundred. They include has said daughters, grandsons and grand-daughter, grandsons and grand-daughter, grandsons and grand-daughter. Besides these she has four sons is last, four daughters in-law.

Refer William of Aughters in-law.

In My, see one granddaughter in law.

Lists Willies M's young sons are going to be dusted at the University of Cassel, and the lastiful Castle of Wilhelmstöne is being direct and refurnished to receive the listle by with their suters and suite. This castle we formerly the residence of the King of Weiphalia (Jerome Bornparte); it was also the prison of Napoleon III. during the Franco-Geman war.

Tentity of Kiew, the Rome of Russia, possaid the shoes or plut the eardals, we reame, of no less a personago than St. loops. These shoes superlatively historical, to sucrete and believed by the faithful to have been work by St. Joseph when he and its Virgin Mary fied into Egypt.

The Duke of Norfolk is very pleased with the improvement which has recently shown held in the health of his only sen, the young lat of Arundel. The improvement has been sets listing than others, and gives rise for make here has been at the distance of the set of t Gater hope as to ultimate recovery. The Earlis now eleven, and is the direct heir to its premier dukedom of England. The Duke is now staying at Arundel Castle with his Intrad of wintering at Corfe, as was her eiginal intention, it is very likely that the Empress of Austria will go to the West Indies in a few weeks, in which case she will makely and the other side of the The Empress has conceived a wish to visit Cubs, Jameica, and Mexico.

STATISTICS.

NEARLY ten per cent. of European flowers are scent-giving.

THERE are said to be thirteen thousand different kinds of postage stamps in the

The force required to open an oyster appears to be 1,319½ times the weight of the shell-less creature.

Russian calculations of the population of China place it at 382 009,000, and the annual increase at 4,000 000.

The great Parliament House clock is the The great Parliament House clock is the largest in the world, and is usually called the Westminster clock. The dials are 22-2 feet in diameter. The depth of the well for the weights is 174 feet. The weight of the minute hand is two hundredweight, and the length 14 feet. The amount of glass used in the dials is 24 tons. The large bell can be heard 10 will be of the trailing of the miles off; the small ones, four to five.

GEMS.

THE best thing is to do the present thing well.

Hz is thy friend who speaks well of thee behind thy back.

The pillow is a dumb sibyl. To sleep upon a thing that is to be done is better than to be wakened up by one already done;

All confidence is dangerous unless it is complete; there are few circumstances in which it is not best, either to hide all, or to tell all.

He who realises and upholds the hallowed character of love in all its forms will never slight it in its highest and holiest; and he who holds loosely the love of a friend or a brother is unworthy to take upon bimself any obliga-tion more secred or binding.

HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.

Feather Cars.—One egg, one cop of swgar, one tablespoonful of burser, one half cop of milk, one and one-half cops of flour, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar, and one half teaspoonful of seda.

Supren Relies.—One and one-helf pounds of the round of steak chopped fine; four crackers rolled fine, two eggs well beaten; butter the size of an egg; p-pper and salt to teste. Mix all tegesher, and bake in a slow oven a half-hour. To be esten celd.

oven a half-hour. To be easten celd.

Rice Griddle Cares —Cook the rice until perfectly soft, drain and mash with a spoon until the grains are well broken up. Foreach oup of rice take two eggs, one plut of milk, and one heaping teaspoonful of yeast powder in flour enough to make a thin batter.

Scalloged Overees.—One quart of oysters, one pound of fine bread crembe; butter a pudding dish, put in a layer of crumbe, and a layer of oysters, sesson each layer with sait, lits of butter, and a little red or white pepper; repeat tiff the cysters are all in, having a layer of crumbe at the top. Pour over the whole one egg becten with one cap of milk. Bake forsy

MISCELLANEOUS.

Marked persons are longer lived than sincle

ALL unclaimed dead bodies found in France are cremated.

GREAT advances are being made in type-setting by machinery.

THOROUGHERED dogs are said to be less intelligent than mongrels.

A COLOREL may allow only ten per cunt, of the men in his regiment to marry.

Hanson cabe have been a failure in Parle, and the horses and hansoms have been sold.

Or the twenty six braves who signed Magna Charta, all but three had to "make their mark," being unable to write.

STEREOTYPING was invented by William God, a Scotch goldsmith, who first designed the process in Edinburgh in 1736.

The largest workshop in the world is that of Herr Krupp, the famous gun-maker. He employs over twenty thousand workmen.

It is said that the character of a sleeping person is indicated by the lines that have been formed in his face by his habits of thinking.

When it becomes possible to tell a friend he has done well without telling him how he might have done better, then watch for the mil-

A FAMOUS firm is advertising "honest scape."
This will no doubt lead to anmongements of "conscientious mustard," and "strictly honourable occa."

A REVOLUTION in Europe is approaching,
The waiters have formed a league or union which is to hold a congress demanding the suppression of the "tip." The garcons prefer a regular salary to the irregularity of the "tip."

A POCKET-TELEPHONE that can be connected to the common electric bell wires of hotele, etc, and carried about in the pocket as a watch—to be used at convenience—is one of the latest novelties in Berlin.

Lovens of cats will appreciate the compliment given to these animals by the late Canon Liddon. He said that the flace attributes of cats were many, but they were hidden by a coat of shyness and pride.

Ir does not do for Japanese newspapers to speak ill even of dead rulers, much less of the speak in ever of dear reasts, meet less of the living. Several Japanese editors have been sentenced to four years' itaprisonment with hard labour for speaking disrespectfully of the Emperor Jimmu, who, if he ever existed, lived about six hundred years ago.

Hene are a few old women's signs which may be read from a cup of tea. If anybody happens to have two specus in his cup it is a sign that he will figure prominently as a wedding before the year is out. If milk or cream is put in your cup before the sugar it will "cross" your love. A tea stalk floating on the top of the tea is called a "stranger." When this happens to unmarried ladies they When this happens to unmarried ladies they should set the tea round briskly and then place the spoon in the centre of the cup, adding it quite still. If the "stranger" in its gyrations is attracted to the spoon, the stranger will come that evening; should it, however, cling to the side he will not come at all. We may observe that it ready, depends on the state of the atmosphere as to whether the stalk goes to the minute or not. It is a sign of fair weather it the clusters of careall air habiles. PINEAPLE MOUNDS.—Steam good tast apples; when tender rub through a colander and sweeten to taste. Soak two-thirds of a box of gelatine in enough water to cover it one hour, pour over it a cup and a half of boiling water; when well dissolved, strain and add a pint of the eifted apple and one-half oup of grated fresh or canned pineapple, or, if preferred, a half-one of the juice of canned pineapple, Pat into custard cups previously wet in odd water. When cold turn out into a pretty sancer, and serve with whipped cream or outsard. a wedding-and so en to the end of the obspter

No. 1

Title pair of pair of stood we stood we robour though their pair of the stood with a some who are the sow and the bottom thought with the bottom with the bottom with the stood with the s

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DOLLY.—A deed of gift must be drawn by a lawyer. Lassiz.—A person under the age of twenty-one cannot be sued for debt.

Baserre.—The name of "Beauchamp" is pronounced as if spoit "Be-cham."

Zillan.—The Duc d'Aumale is a son of the late King Louis Philippe.

KREWARD.—Mr. Bradlaugh has never voted for a Royal grant.

Chowly.—All Staffordabire wills are proved in the Probate Registry at Lichfield.

COMSTART READER.—If two strangers marry two isters they do not become relations of each other. Synvia.—We do not answer questions as to raffice or other lotteries. They are illegal.

AMERIT.—We do not know if a doctor can charge a double fee at the birth of twins.

BRORES HEART.—If your husband is willing that you hould return to him, and you are not willing to return, ou can have no claim upon him.

A. T. S.—1. A distress must be levied between sunrise and sunset. 2. Furniture on the hire system cannot be suffed for debts.

LOVEL.—1. 25, Southampton-buildings, W.C. 2. Five chillings is the registration fee, but application must be made either personally or by sgent.

Hook.—Hoek, a light yellowish wine, is made at Hookhetm (from which place it takes its name), on the River Main, in Germany. It is either still or sparkling.

RODERICK —1. Commander Nares went within 400 miles of the North Fols. 2. No graniverous animals seen a long way below that limit.

Askious Oss.—A father is liable for the maintenance of a daughter so long as she is unable to earn her own living.

Donn.—If your parents become chargeable to the parish, you must pay such sum as the guardians or the magistrates may adjudge.

O. D. T.—No. Water will remain at same temperature ne matter how long it boils—that is, at normal or sea level; take it to a mountain top, and, though it still boils, the temperature will be less.

If Wast of Advice.—Obviously he must take what he can get to do, and as many are in that position in the colonies, we think he is just throwing away money in emigrating.

Ears.—Dublin time is about twenty minutes behind Giasque and Edinburgh time, because Scotland is so much nearer the east than Ireland, therefore gets the sun so much earlier.

D. A. S.—At the death of your sister without a will, all that she possesses, after payment of her debts, will fall to be divided in equal shares to her surviving brothers, some having a preference.

STRUE.—Saint Stephen was the first martyr of the Christian Church. The Jews charged him with speaking against the law and the temple, against Moses, and against God, and, by order of the Sanhedrim, he was stoned. See Acts, chapters 6 and 7.

FAITH.—Your letter is creditable both to your head and to your heart. We predict that you will grow into a useful, highly-esteemed woman, and that you will yet, by your good advice, save many from deaths more terrible than are met with in a burning building.

CURIOSITY.—"Pigeon-breast" may either indicate spinal weakness or spinal strength. In the latter case it is the result of practising erect carriage of the body, and is a notable characteristic of soldiers and others who have been subjected, or who subject themselves, to daily drill.

Boros.—We never recommend investments, but we may recall the Duke of Wellington's observation for your beneft..." increase of interest means decrease, security." If the investment were an inviting one there would be no need to offer big interest to attract recover both.

Sings Rov.—The phrase sider roy, or red soldier, was the name given to the regular regiments in Soctiand to distinguish them from the independent companies rated to probent the peace of the Highlands, which were called the sider sha, or black soldiers. The 4lnd Regiment, which was formed out of these companies, is still known as the "Black Watch."

B. S.—The Bundesrath represents the individual States of Germany, and the Belchstag the German nation. The members of the Bundesrath, 59 in number, are appointed by the government of the individual States for each session; those of the Reichstag, 397 in number, are elected by universal suffrage and the ballot for the term of three years. The States are represented in both bodies proportionately to their population.

in both bodies proportionalely to their population.

Wormind Ovz.—This certain that the removal, at pplug, and cleansing of the teeth by a daily brushing with an amphorated chalk will do a good deal towards poutlying the breath, but we imagine the offonsiveness is owing to some extent to dyspopala or indigestion, which must be cured by rearrangement and regulation of diet and strict attention to the stomach. A carbolic mooth wesh offers the handlest means of obtaining temporary relief, and a drop or two of Condy's fluid taken in water will serve the same purpose. Do not use both carbolic and Condy, however.

CHRISTMAS DOUBLE NUMBER OF THE "LONDON READER." (Price Twopence.)

AT ON NOVEMBER 25th, WITH NO. 1440, WILL BE PUBLISHED OUR EXTRA CHRISTMAS NUMBER. CONTAINING THE CHARMING COMPLETE STORY, ENTITIED

ALSO THE OPENING CHAPTERS OF

BRILLIANT ORIGINAL SERIAL STORY.

GREAT COST"

AND OUR CHRISTMAS NOVELETTE,

"LADY EILEEN'S CHRISTMAS."

WITH ATTRACTIVE POETRY, SEASONABLE PARAGRAPHS, AND A FUND OF WITTY AND HUMOROUS GATHERINGS.

WILLOW WARE.

On grandmamma's table is waiting for me
A plate with gingerbread piled,
Bread and milk, and berries and cream,
And the nug marked "For a good child."
And I eat my supper and wonder where That wonderful land may be.
Where the say is white and the earth is blue,
That on my plate I see.

"Grandma, you know 'meet everything— Tell the story of it all; Do the long-tailed birds know how to sing? Did a princess ive in that eastle small? The princess' hair in a fairy take Is generally gold, but this is blue. How does the boat go without any sail? Tell me the story, grandmamma, do."

So she talls me the legend, centuries old, Of the mandarin, rich in lands and gold; Of Li-chit fair and Chang the good, Who loved each other as lovers should; How they hid in the gardener's hut awhile, Them fled away to the Beautiful Isle; Though the cruel father pursued them there, And would have killed the hapless pair; But a kindly Power, by pity stirred, Changed each into a beautiful bird.

Grandmamma puts her spectacles on, And shows me on the plate The mandario's house, the island home, The bat, the bridge, the gate. "Here is the orange tree where they talked— Here they are running away— and over all at the top you see The birds making love alway."

And the odd little figures seem to live— Strange fancies fill my head, Till grandmamms tells me, much too soon, It's time to go to bod.

But I dream of a land all blue and white, I see the lovers take their flight;
Over the arching bridge they go—
One of the lover brids flies below—
From the little house with the turned-up edges
Come tiny lords and ladies and pages;
And the bedpost turns to a willow tree,
And at last I seem myself to be An asure lassic wandering through That beauuful queer little land of blue.

INQUIRER.—The "West of America," reckoning from the British geographical position, includes practically the whole of the manufacturing districts. Duluth is a flourishing town. If you have friends there who can put you in the way of getting a situation, you need not hesitate to go out. You may get to St. John's, Now-foundland, by Allan Line from Glasgow, for about £4 10s. Resch there in ten days. It is in British North America, or Canadian Dominion, and is considerably colder than Bootland.

CLAUDIA.—No one can decide for you in a comparison between Burns and Scott, because no two persons will agree regarding what is true greatness. We should say Scott was the man of greatest mind, and Burns the man of greatest heart. Scott appeals to the feelings by his stirring songs and tender lays, running the whole gamut of human experience from herofc outburst to love-stok plaint, every sapiration which his country men or women have experienced finds expression in his poems, and he kindles onthusiasm where Scott, immeasurably his superior as a literary man, awakens only admi-ration.

OSE IN DEFERES.—Interment in any cemetery is permitted only under special conditions insisted upon by the authorities. You will find you have signed a document binding you to put up the headstone, and that you must therefore do it.

SATURN.—The reign of Saturn, an ancient mythical king or deity of Italy, was called the golden are of that country, to which, in consequence, the same of Saturnia was given. The same name was also given to June, as being the daughter of Saturn.

Farm.—An old superstition has it that every ments of the year is under the influence of a particular gen. Thus the garnet, which signifies constancy and twith, is assigned to January, the smethyst (elinerity) is Petruary, the bloodstone (courage and presence of min) to March, the diamond (unnecence) to April, the essential (success in love) to May, the agate (health and length) to June, the cornelism (content) to July, the saviety (conjugal bits) to August, the curysole (a charm against meanity) to September, the opal (tope) to Orbobs, the tops: (delity) to November, and the turqueise (presently) to December.

perity) to December.

TROUBLED ONE.—You must keep at work trying to inspire your son with a love of truth. It may be that you made truth and goodness repulsive to him by dosing him with assections under the name of truth. Or, perhaps, you have been so solicitious, and have steed so unwisely in the matter as to have "cornered" him, or argued him first into prevariention, and from this into falsehood. Some parents have a most permision way of browbeating a child, and of doubting its takements, and of exclaiming, "Come, now, tell the truth; none of your lying to me," and suchlike insulting surrages on the helplessness of childhood.

Expire.—There are said to be over 50,000 "King's Daughters" in the United States. This charitable organisation was formed in this city on January II, 1836. The motto chosen by the members is:—

"Look up and not down,

"Look up and not down, Look forward and not back, Look out and not in, Lend a hand."

Luca.—Falling out of the hair is frequently the result of the weakness of the nervous power. Staving the scalp is sometimes beneficial, if it is followed by dry friction, tonic lotions, and a stimulating dist. Another course which sometimes stops the falling out is to plunge the head into cold water every morning and night, and, after the hair is thoroughly dried, to brush it briskly until the scalp is glowing.

THE LONDON READER, Post-free. Three-halfpenon Weekly; or Quarterly One Shilling and Eightpense.

ALL BACK NUMBERS, PARTS and VOLUMES are in print, and may be had of all booksellers.

NOTICE —Part 346, Now Ready, price Sixpence, post-free, Rightpence. Also Vol. LV., bound in cloth, 4s. 6d.

ALL LETTERS TO BE ADDRESSED TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON READER, 234, Strand, W.C.

tit We cannot undertake to return rejected manuscripts.

London: Published for the Proprietor, at 334, Strand, by J. R. Sprok: and Printed by Woodfall and Kinds, 70 to 76, Long Acre, W.C.